Dear Sir,—You ask in your last issue, referring to Handel, 'If he is not the most popular composer in the world, who is?' I should say that Handel certainly cannot claim that honour. It is, of course, impossible to attempt any statistics, but this distinction surely seems nowadays to belong to Wagner. Let us consider the two composers. Handel is practically confined to the Anglo-Saxon countries, where his works are heard in concert-rooms or places of worship. Wagner, on the other hand, is constantly heard in every civilized country in the world, in theatres and opera-houses, concert rooms, and even cafés. I do not think any other composer's music has such a universal hearing.

Yours truly,

Henry Coates.

Obituary.

Rev. Canon Gorton.

We deeply regret to have to record the death of the Rev. Canon Charles Vincent Gorton, of Vaga House, on the banks of the River Wye, Hereford, which took place under very distressing circumstances on August 20. For some years he had been suffering from partial paralysis, and lived in retirement at Hereford. On the afternoon of the 20th he was seated in a Bath chair on the lawn, accompanied by his eldest son, Mr. Neville Gorton. For a moment Mr. Neville went indoors, and on his return he saw that his father had fallen into the river, which was at high flood. He at once plunged to his assistance, but had the grief of witnessing his father's disappearance. Up to the time of writing, August 23, the body has not been recovered.

The deceased was a scholar of Hertford College, Oxon. He began his clerical life as curate of St. Margaret's, Altrincham, in the diocese of Chester. Later he was at Wallasey, and he was Vicar of St. Barnabas, Crewe, from 1885 to 1889; and from 1889 until 1909 he was Rector of Poulton-le-Sands in Lancashire. He was made honorary Canon of Manchester Cathedral in 1902. But it is his contact with music that deserves most notice in this journal. Canon Gorton's rectorship at Poulton located him at Morecambe. Stimulated by the late Miss Wakefield, of Kendal, he became one of the first and most active promoters of the well-known Morecambe Musical Festival, which at first was a small affair but eventually grew to very great proportions and exercised a remarkable influence over choral technique in the North of England. The high artistic and educational aims of the scheme, and the eminence of the musicians who were in turn associated with it, made the Festival the Mecca of the best-trained small choirs of the wide district appealed to. The tests were drawn from the finest sources, and showed a catholic taste that did not, however, ignore patriotic claims for recognition. Canon Gorton was not a practical musician, but he had fine ideals and insight. He had visions and dreams, some of which took practical shape. In strictly musical matters he was greatly guided by the late R. G. W. Howson, a man of fine musical taste and accomplishments. Perhaps the most notable incident in the late Canon's career, so far as regards its connection with music, was his friendship with Sir Edward Elgar, which was brought about by a visit of the composer to Morecambe in the capacity of adjudicator. This sympathetic intercourse led to Canon Gorton writing two pamphlets dealing with the spirit and meaning of the composer's oratorios, 'The Apostles' and 'The Kingdom.' He also wrote an historical sketch of the 'Sagas of King Olaf.' Another activity in which he took great interest was the adaptation of English words to German vocal music. Some of the first performances of Brahms's part-songs in this country were sung in his translations. One of Elgar's most recent part-songs, 'There is sweet music,' is dedicated to Canon Gorton.

Henry Lahee.

The death on April 29 of Henry Lahee, at the age of eighty-six years, will recall many memories to English musicians now living who were pleasantly associated with him in his active days.

He was born at Chelsea on April 11, 1826. At that period the Goss family were near neighbours of, and were very intimate with, the Lahees. Henry Lahee received his musical education privately from Sterndale Bennett, John Goss, and Cipriani Potter, and was organist at Holy Trinity Church, Brompton, from 1847 to 1874. He was not a prolific composer, but all that he did in composition was distinguished by the excellence of its craft and the mark of fine taste. He had a leaning to the madrigal and glee traditions, and therefore always wrote real vocal music. He gained the Bristol madrigal prize ('Hark, how the birds') in 1869, the Manchester prize ('Hence, loathed melancholy') in 1878, the Glasgow prize ('Away to the hunt') in 1879, and the London Madrigal Society's prizes in 1880 ('Love in my bosom') and 1884 ('Ah! woe is me'). Another prize which is valued among the heirlooms of the family is a goblet he gained in a Nottingham Glee Club competition. Amongst other choral music of this type that has been popular are the part-songs 'The unfaithful shepherdess' and 'Love me little, love me long,' and especially the trio for female voices, 'Ring out, wild bells.' He also composed anthems, songs and instrumental pieces that have had useful vogue. His most considerable works were a setting of Longfellow's poem, 'The building of the ship,' for mixed voices, and of Tennyson's 'Sleeping Beauty' for female voices. The latter work has been justly described as being among the best cantatas ever written for female voices. He was probably one of the oldest, if not the oldest, surviving member of the Philharmonic Society. Often in late years he would relate his early reminiscences of the enthusiasm with which Mendelssohn was received and the interest created by Madame Schumann's first appearance.

He retired from the profession about fifteen years ago. Failing sight hampered him in his last days, but he never became quite blind. His death was perfectly peaceful. His wife and eight children all survive. Their pang at the parting must have been softened by the thought that a useful and honourable life had been prolonged so happily and ended so tranquilly.

The late Mr. Hamilton Clarke.

It is proposed to erect a simple monument to the memory of the late Mr. Hamilton Clarke, whose death on July 9 was recorded in our August number. Musicians and others who desire to do honour to the memory of the deceased are invited to send subscriptions to the Rev. Dr. Whittaker, Chaplain's House, Banstead Downs, Sutton, Surrey. The deceased was buried in Banstead Parish Churchyard on July 15.

MUSIC AT THE COURT OF FREDERICK THE GREAT.

By Jeffrey Pulver.

Since this year began it has been almost impossible to open a German review or magazine without lighting upon the name Friedrich der Grosse—a revival of interest due largely to the fact that the date of the birth of the King of Prussia subtracted from the present year gives just two centuries. The great monarch has been reviewed, criticised, praised, and commented upon from every point of view, with varying degrees of completeness and accuracy. He has been discussed as king, as statesman, as commander, and as literary aspirant; but on one side he has not yet been seriously considered, and this is Frederick the musician. It is in this aspect that we find him more interesting than in any other; for in it we see him in what is, perhaps, his most favourable light; indeed, Macaulay thought that more could be learned of his character 'by what passed during his hours of relaxation than by his battles or by his laws.' The bi-centenary celebrations that brought into the light of to-day the memory of the military, political, and regal glories of this many-sided prince may well be left to the nation that benefited by his rule; but what he did for the music of his age, and the influence he exercised upon that of the succeeding generation, concerns us in England as much as the methods he used for the consolidation of his kingdom concern the descendants of his own subjects.

Considering his musical activity, it is very easy to forget for a moment that Frederick had another vocation that called for incomparably more time and pains than did music, but this forgetfulness is easily excusable when we remember that he found time, although filling the triple office of king, minister, and commander-in-chief, to devote some hours each day to the practise of music, and to the further development of the art in Prussia.

Frederick's predecessor, Friedrich Wilhelm, completely neglected all the arts; opera could not be given when the money was wanted for the enlargement of barracks, nor could Frederick learn music as long as the fee that his teacher would take could be used to purchase a fantastically tall grenadier. And besides this niggardliness there was Friedrich Wilhelm's ingrained aversion to all things that were not 'practical'; an aversion that amounted to a mania, which gave evidence of its existence by the occasional breaking of a walking-stick over the innocent head of the thoughtless tutor who ventured to lead his pupil through the intricacies of the 'Aurea Bulla.'

It need not be specially mentioned therefore, that a father who rigidly excluded the study of languages, literature, and the arts from his son's curriculum would have been transported into a state of frenzy at the very mention of music as a pastime. But what might not be done openly could with a little trouble be managed in secret; and just as his mother encouraged Frederick in the secret study of French, so did she also help him in the acquirement of music, and engage teachers for this purpose. The famous Joseph Joachim Quanz came from Dresden twice a year and taught the young prince to play the flute, and others trained him in theory. Were we not thoroughly acquainted with Frederick's tenacity of purpose, we would be quite justified in supposing the study of music under such circumstances to be impossible; but what Fritz set out to do, he generally accomplished. What if he did have to hide in a wood or cave with his musical friends when they wished to practise? The matter has a certain tinge of humour about it that would raise merriment were we not so well acquainted with the misery of Frederick's youth; but the Gilbertian touch is not entirely wanting, for Dr. Charles Burney, travelling in Prussia in 1772, says: 'Quanz told me that the late Queen-Mother encouraged the Prince in his favourite amusement, and who engaged musicians for him. But so secretly had this to be done, that had the King found it out, "All these sons of Apollo would have incurred the danger of being hanged."' Macaulay further tells us, in his essay on the second Frederick, that when imprisoned by his father for his so-called desertion from the army, he was able 'to play his flute without having it broken over his head—his gaolers were thus more tender than his father.'

Frederick's marriage and subsequent accession altered these conditions; the band of faithful musicians he had formed were transferred to Potsdam (for 'Sans Souci' was the favourite sojourn of the King when not politically engaged), and their numbers augmented by the engagement of some of Europe's foremost musicians. His day, as we know from the pages of Carlyle, Macaulay, Kugler, &c., was mathematically divided so that no moment was lost. We also know that in each day some time was consecrated to the practise of the flute and to the writing of music; the time between seven o'clock and the supper hour was occupied by a concert, a gathering for the encouragement and practise of the best music at the period. A. von Menzel's famous picture of a 'Concert at "Sans Souci"' will be familiar to most, even in this country; and from it we can form an excellent idea of these functions: Frederick, tall, severe, and lean, stands before his music-stand playing one of Quanz's concerti; Franz Benda is Conzertmeister; Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach is at the pianoforte. Shortly before the hour for starting, Frederick has carefully tried over the more intricate passages of the cadenzas he has himself written for his concerti; the orchestra is kept waiting in an ante-room. When the king has spent some time in technical exercises (he loved to call these Solfeggi, and some volumes of them are still to be seen at Potsdam), he will call in his band and the daily concert will commence.

Dr. Burney, ever curious for information, as befits a man who is touring the Continent in search of material for his proposed 'History of Music,' was smuggled into the palace and hidden behind some hangings. In the diary of this tour, which he published in 1773, he gives his criticism of Frederick's performance: 'His embouchure was clear and even, his finger brilliant, and his taste pure and simple. I was much pleased and even surprised with the neatness of his execution . . . as well as by the feeling and expression. . . . In short, his performance surpassed in many particulars anything I had ever heard among dilettanti or even professors.' His technical excellence, of course, was due to his life-long study; in his eighth year he already played the flute, for in the accounts of pocket-money spent when at that age, we find the entry, 'For mending the flute, four groschen.' Occasion for surprise that he could continue this practice when discharging the many duties that fell to the king is amply provided if we remember the countless things he insisted upon doing himself. But when he wished to think out some new plan, or formulate new military methods, he would take his flute and pace the long corridors of 'Sans Souci,' and allow his tootling to 'assist his magination.'

But many royal musicians could play an instrument well, and compose a piece also; herein does not lie Frederick's greatest musical importance. It is rather in his patronage of some of the most renowned of musicians that his interest to the musical historian is centred. His training had made of him a discerning critic, and he was able to tell the good musician from the bad without having to depend upon the advice of friends who wished to bring their own particular protégés into royal favour. He heard Franz Benda practising through the open windows of an inn, and recognised him to be what he was—a violinist far above the average, and he engaged him, after having given him an audition at the palace, where he himself accompanied the violinist on the pianoforte. This patronage of Benda gave the world a new school of violin-playing, the so-called 'Berlin School,' one that so far as true musicianship goes produced the finest string players ever heard. But the engagement of Benda alone could not have produced this result; at this Court the violinist met such musicians as C. H. Graun, his brother, J. G. Graun, and Quanz; and the influence of these composers and performers of Italian training, added to Benda's Bohemian taste and originality, formed the beginning of what was later to produce such artistically important results. Burney says of Benda: 'His style is not that of Tartini, Somis, or Veracini, nor that of the head of any one school or musical sect; it is his own, and formed from that model which should be ever studied by all instrumental performers—good singing.'

The third son of the great Johann Sebastian Bach—Carl Philipp Emanuel—was engaged as Frederick's accompanist as early as 1738, and was one of the most interesting figures that adorned this Court. Enjoying a great reputation and occupying the highest position in the musical world of Germany, as much on account of his witty geniality and sociability as for his profound learning and true musicianship, he is remembered now as a composer of great merit and as the greatest developer of the sonata-form. He frequently spoke of his father, and Frederick as frequently asked him to invite Johann Sebastian to Potsdam; but the Cantor always found some excuse for not complying. At length, however, he agreed to visit Frederick and give him the opportunity of hearing and marvelling at the greatest wonder of musical history. He arrived at Potsdam in May, 1747, and Frederick, looking through the list of strangers who had arrived during the day, lighted upon the name of Bach. He was just about to put the flute to his lips when the paper was handed him. He had glanced through it coldly, but when he came to the magic name his whole visage altered; his eye lit up, and laying his flute aside he said, 'Gentlemen, old Bach is come.' After having waited so long to see and hear this musical giant, impetuous Fritz could not be expected to wait any longer now that 'old Bach' was so near; he therefore sent word by the son that Johann Sebastian was to present himself without delay. Time was not even allowed him to change from his travelling dress into his 'schwarzer Cantor-Rock,' and in a very few minutes he was at the palace. Frederick had by now given up all idea of a concert for that evening, and devoted himself entirely to his distinguished guest. Enthusiastically he led Bach from one apartment of the palace to another, and where a pianoforte was found the Cantor had to perform—now to improvise, now to construct a fugue; every sort of musical exercise was thought of and asked of the Leipsic magician. The king gave a theme, and the visitor treated it fugally; and all the while the enthusiasm of Frederick and of the band who followed them grew until Bach was looked upon as a sort of musical idol. A six-part fugue was demanded, and Bach, choosing the theme himself, satisfied the demand in the most brilliant fashion. When he returned to Leipsic he worked out the royal theme more elaborately, and adding some other compositions to it, sent the volume to Frederick as the famous 'Musikalisches Opfer.'

Of all the eligible Capellmeister, Carl Heinrich Graun seems to have been the one most suited to Frederick's tastes; at all events, the king would hear very few operas that were not composed by him. Indeed, the works of Graun and Hasse were, with very few exceptions, the only ones he would permit at his opera-house. In these operas some of the finest singers that Italy ever produced appeared, and it is for this raising of the operatic standard in Prussia that Frederick merits more space in the history of music than he occupies at present.

Graun's activity as a composer was very great and varied. Between 1747 and 1756 he wrote and had performed at the Opera no fewer than twenty-seven Italian operas, and in them the brightest stars of Italian vocalism created the title-rôles. The world-renowned Giovanna Astrua first appeared in the Pastoral composed by Graun and others, for which Frederick himself wrote several numbers; Carestini supported her. Felice Salinbeni created Cæsar in 'Catone in Utica' (1744); and so also appeared Elizabeth Schmeling, Signora Agricola, Signora Gasparini, Pasqualino Bruscolini, and Porporino.

The opera-house that Frederick built in 1742 was the most magnificent in Europe. Graun was in Italy at the time, and engaged the singers. Burney tells us that the orchestra consisted of fifty of Germany's finest instrumentalists. The establishment was complete in all details—a ballet-master, a troop of dancers, a chorus, and everything that could be thought of at that period was done to make the place worthy of its object. The expense of it all was defrayed by the king. Admission was free to all properly accredited persons. We can thus look upon this opera-house as a sort of royal hobby, one that was built for the pleasure of the king in the first place; but we cannot deny that a more public-spirited motive lay behind, and that the ultimate object was the revival of an art that had lain dormant during the reign of Frederick's predecessor.

Such was the Opera for which Graun composed; an arduous duty, for Frederick was not an indulgent task-master. In addition he was ever severely critical with his servants, and on one occasion he said to his cembalist Fasch; 'Graun should have a thoroughly first-rate man beside him to spur him on; but where is all the money to come from to pay such men?' Nevertheless, when surrounded by enemies in Bohemia, this king, hearing while on the battlefield of the death of Graun, said: 'Eight days ago I lost my best field-marshal (Schwerin), and now my Graun. I shall create no more field-marshals or conductors until I can find another Schwerin and another Graun.'

Interesting as Frederick was in politics, in war, with his band, or in the streets of Potsdam, he was perhaps still more so in the opera-house. There he played the part of commander-in-chief as he did on the parade-ground. Standing behind the conductor or the harpsichordist, he directed the proceedings as only a musician could, and as a man who felt he had a proprietary right to do so. 'He is such a strict disciplinarian,' says Burney, 'that if a mistake is made in a single movement, or evolution, he immediately marks and rebukes the offender, and if any of his Italian troops dare deviate from strict discipline by adding, altering, or diminishing a single passage in the parts they have to perform, an order is sent "de par le Roi" for them to adhere strictly to the notes written by the composer at their peril.' But musician as Burney undoubtedly was, he does not entirely agree with Frederick for this severity. The learned Doctor was doubtlessly also infected with the habits and fashions of the period, for he goes on to say, 'This when compositions are good and singers licentious, may be an excellent method, but certainly shuts out all taste and refinement.' Here we need not necessarily agree with him; why should 'taste and refinement' be dependent upon the caprice of a singer who ostentatiously wishes to show off his or her florid and cadential twists and twirls at the expense of the composer's simplicity of diction? We know that Frederick's taste in music was pure and simple; we are therefore not surprised to find him waging vigorous war upon the spoiled children of the vocal art, who sacrificed the composer's intentions to their love of pyrotechnical display.

In those words so innocently uttered by Dr. Burney, we see another reason for praising the memory of the great Frederick. This was his successful attempt to simplify the music of his age; he was averse to ornamentation which was introduced with the sole object of proving the performer's technical skill—a tendency that led to a style so overloaded with useless ornament that the original object of the art could scarcely be discerned. In gathering around him the musicians he did, he secured the music of his concerts and his opera from this abuse; and remembering the great influence

Frederick had over the artistic world, we may take it that much of the reform was directly due to his endeavours and those of the musicians he patronised and befriended.

One thing is especially noticeable when we read the names that have frequently been quoted in this article; it is that while all the singers, with the exception of the Schmeling, have been Italians, the instrumentalists have always been Germans, and so have the conductors and composers. Frederick, as we know, would have nothing to do with German literature or the German language; and because he once said 'What! a German singer perform an aria? I would as soon hear my horse neigh it,' several otherwise broad-minded historians have come to the conclusion that he extended his prejudice over all German music. Nothing could be further removed from the fact. We have seen how early in his musical career Frederick had Germans in his service; and we also know that the only operas he would have were those of German composers; the only concession that can be made is that he preferred the Italian methods of vocal production to those of the Germans, but that in all other branches of the art he was a staunch supporter of the national talent; and in this respect Frederick undoubtedly chose correctly. On the morning following the concert that Burney had overheard, Quanz told the Doctor that of the three concerti the king had played, one was written by the flautist over forty years earlier, and that the other two 'were made twenty years ago; these pieces have stood their ground very well.' And this Burney very rightly takes to be 'an indication of a sound judgment and of great discernment in his Majesty to adhere thus firmly to the productions of a period which may be called the Augustan age in music.'

The example set at Court can have had no other effect than to popularise the art in society; and many concerts in which the ablest musicians performed the best of music testify to the hold that music was gaining in Frederick's capital. Ernst Friedrich Benda, in collaboration with Karl Bachmann, founded that famous series of concerts that were so popular in Berlin, and which ran uninterruptedly and successfully from 1770 to 1797. The influence of the king did not stop here; at the Court of Dresden the Princess Maria Antonia sang, played, and composed, in a truly professional manner. Her operas, for which she wrote the libretti as well as the music, were highly valued, and his Majesty of Prussia was her warmest friend and counsellor. She sent her work to her royal colleague for criticism, and Frederick wrote her the most complimentary of letters. One of her operas—'Il trionfo della fedeltà'—was produced by royal command at Potsdam; and for this performance Frederick himself composed an extra aria.

Reviewing this great musical activity of the king, it is difficult to realise that so large a proportion of his time was spent on the battlefield; but this did not interfere with his practice or enjoyment of music. As soon as the enemy permitted him to settle in winter quarters, the band was summoned in sections by turn, and the everlasting flute brought out again.

Such, then, was Frederick the musician; a personage as interesting to the student of 18th century art and culture as he is to the student of military tactics; a man who, had he not been a king, would have been as important on this account alone as were any of the other noble patrons of music. What Esterhazy did for Haydn, Frederick the Great of Prussia did for many, but with this difference: Frederick raised the standard of the art for the whole of Prussia, and set an example that led to the betterment of all conditions in the musical world of his epoch, and for this we are justified in honouring his memory now, just two centuries after the day on which his advent caused such joy in his future kingdom.

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The 'Promenades' have probably never opened more brilliantly than they did on August 17. The magnitude of the audience seemed to surpass all previous experience, and the absence of extreme heat left the listeners freer than on other crowded occasions to enjoy and to applaud. Enthusiasm was spontaneous, eager, and thoroughly impartial. British musicians played an honourable part in the proceedings. The most important and the best received of the less-familiar works in the programme was Mr. Hamilton Harty's bright and attractive 'Comedy Overture,' and an exceptional trio of soloists was found in Miss Carrie Tubb, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. York Bowen. Beethoven's 'Egmont' Overture, Tchaikovsky's '1812,' Wagner's 'Tannhäuser' Overture, and Wormser's suite, 'L'enfant prodigue,' helped to make up an excellent 'popular' programme.

Monday, August 19, was the first Wagner night, with a much-familiarized programme and a large audience. August 20 brought the first hearing in England of a Piedmontese Suite by Sinigaglia that recalled his Piedmontese Dances, especially in the use of folk-tunes. On August 21 three pieces by Fiocco, orchestrated by Mr. Norman O'Neill, were performed for the first time. The adapter deserves praise for the restraint and modesty with which he has moulded the tempting medium of the modern orchestra to the modest design of the old composer. Given such judgment as Mr. O'Neill has shown, there is a large field open for the unemployed composer in the re-orchestration of old music. The same concert provided the first hearing in England of a triple Concerto for violin, violoncello, and pianoforte by Paul Juon. There was no obvious reason why it should not be the last hearing in England. The most patient and sympathetic listening failed to detect beauty or other merit beyond that of an occasional fine passage of rhetoric that emerged as if by accident from an arid waste of ascetic modernism. Long and well-deserved applause was showered upon the three gifted ladies—Misses Marjorie Hayward, May Mukle and Auriol Jones—who provided the performance. Afterwards Brahms's third Symphony was given a romantic performance.

THE JAQUES-DALCROZE TRAINING SCHOOL AT DRESDEN.

The Jaques-Dalcroze Training School for rhythmic gymnastics at Hellerau, near Dresden, celebrated its first annual School Festival during the days of June 28 to 30, with interesting demonstrations of rhythmic gymnastics in their simple and more highly-applied forms. A few words with regard to the new buildings in which this remarkable institution is housed may be acceptable. As to this we cannot do better that quote the official prospectus, which states that 'the management of the Jaques-Dalcroze Training School has built a festival hall in accordance with the designs of the architect, Herr Heinrich Tressenow, and with the artistic assistance of the painter, Herr Alexander von Falzmann, which, in its clear, simple proportions does not pretend to be anything but an enclosed space.' The lighting of the stage and the auditorium has been most ingeniously arranged, producing a result of ideal simplicity. It is an evenly distributed, not directly visible, and absolutely shadeless light, which can be increased and decreased at will. The border between the stage and the audience is occupied by the space for an orchestra of sixty performers. There is no stage curtain. The performances on each day commenced with simple rhythmic-gymnastic exercises. These were followed by graceful dances for the girls and march-like movements. Later on came rhythmic-plastic interpretations of emotions such as joy, brightness, pain, sadness, fury, hatred, &c. The climax of the proceedings was reached by movements associated with the performance of J. S. Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C minor from the first part of the 'Wohltemperirte Klavier' (the three parts of the fugue being beautifully represented by twelve girls and six youths), the same composer's Invention in G minor, and the Prelude and Fugue in E minor by Mendelssohn. Magnificent also was the musical and plastic presentment of the first part of the second Act of Gluck's 'Orféo,' with its choruses and dances of the Furies. Fräulein Emm Leisner sang the short air of 'Orféo' very beautifully. M. Jaques-Dalcroze, who had himself composed an Idylle, 'Écho,' and other charming musical items, was the recipient of ovations of a most enthusiastic character which were fully deserved, as the importance of his idea and work for the purposes of the musical education of the individual was on these occasions more strikingly demonstrated than ever before.

THE CULT OF FOLK-SONG AND DANCE.

SUMMER SCHOOL, STRATFORD-UPON-AVON.

In October, 1911, the Musical Times gave an account of the scheme formulated by the Governors of the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre at Stratford-upon-Avon for the establishment of a school for the teaching of English folk-dancing and singing in their wonderfully interesting town, and the appointment of Mr. Cecil Sharp, the greatest authority on both these branches of folk-lore, as Director. In last month's issue (p. 524), extracts were given from the syllabus issued by Mr. Sharp for this year's session, which began on August 3 and was announced to continue until August 31.

A visit made during the second week of the course found the School and the expert teachers associated with Mr. Sharp hard at work. Over one hundred students, chiefly school-teachers, had attended during the first week, and the number present during the period of my visit was hardly less. What struck me especially on roaming round the various rooms in which folk-songs were being learned and talked about and Morris-dances (in several stages), sword-dances and children's games were being practised, was the note of joy and exhilaration that seemed to permeate every one concerned. There was always the glad eye and the glad smile, even at failure. No doubt this happy feeling on the part of those who were actively engaged arises from the constant and, I would add, rhythmic vitality involved in the dancing. Surely here we have all the factors for a 'cure' for many complaints! I offer the idea to the Governors.

In the earlier part of each morning the students assembled in one of the largest rooms of the Technical School to sing folk-songs. All had books giving the melody (in both notations) and words, and the songs were practised without any attempt at systematic teaching of verbal expression; there was no distraction as to voice-production and registers, and even no worry as to clear articulation, but in a free and easy, jovial fashion all voices, men and women (who greatly preponderated) sang the melodies and the words. Those who could not read from notes 'picked up.' Of course, this plan of acquiring the songs is adopted deliberately as the best means of getting them known quickly and pleasantly by all concerned; yet one felt that if in addition to this practice the students who desired it could be taught to read fluently from notation and to go through a technical study of the tonal and rhythmical construction of the tunes, they would be safer and better teachers. The communal mind so often appealed to by Mr. Sharp in reference to the evolution of the folk-song is apt to drift to-day as it is said to have done of yore. But the School does not affect to provide a complete musical education, so far as musical ability is demanded by the folk-song and dance. That counsel of perfection must at present be deferred. While folk-song and dance have both to be dealt with in a few weeks, the necessity of getting to the technics of the dancing is imperative and absorbing. There is no doubt, however, that this form of practice does result in the songs being memorised. A point which struck me with regard to the musical result was that all the singing I heard was in tune. There was no disposition to flatten. This result has often been noticed in the rough and ready combined unison singing of songs that have been picked up by ear. One may hear a group of hobbledehoys in the street shouting a music-hall song in strained, raucous tones, but they keep the pitch; and on the other hand one may hear as many trained singers whose intonation is not so satisfactory. Is it that the preoccupation of the mind in realising the 'thing' through the 'sign' takes away anything from pitch and interval memory? Mr. Sharp tells me that the folk-singer rarely, if ever, flattens.

All concerned with the sing-songs seemed even more intent on studying the Morris and other dances, thus displaying a new and interesting variety of foot-and-mouth disease that it may be hoped will spread galore! Folk-songs are easily learned, but folk-dancing is a much more technical business—there are so many ways of going wrong. At the Conference reported below, Mr. Selby Bigge asked what was the ultimate value of the study of folk-dancing? There are, I imagine, many answers to this question, but one would be, from the musical educationist, that it developed in a remarkable degree the sense or rhythm—a faculty so often allowed to lie dormant in this country. But, watching the dancing and hearing the indispensable music associated with it, the reflection is borne upon one that the propaganda up and down the country depends greatly upon the ability and especially the rhythmic sensitiveness of the players of the instruments. At Stratford most of the groups enjoyed the services of an excellent lady violinist, and of Mr. Sharp himself at the pianoforte. In olden times natural selection led to the survival of the fittest fiddlers or other instrumentalists, and something of the same process will have to happen to-day. Another branch for the School—how to play for the dancing!

CONFERENCE ON FOLK-SONG AND DANCE.

This was held in the Memorial Lecture Room on August 13. It was organized by the Governors because, as they state in their invitation, they were naturally anxious that the standard set, both in classes and demonstrations, should be in harmony with the best traditions, so far as that was possible, their object being to help to establish a lasting interest in this subject throughout the country. They hoped that a discussion, joined in by those who had taken an active part in the movement, would produce valuable suggestions and help to remove some misconceptions which existed. The chair was taken by Mr. Archie Flower.

The Chairman said he hoped the Conference would assist the Governors to find points of agreement rather than an accentuation of points of difference. The three questions were: (1) was it wise to establish the School? (2) if so, what standards should be set? (3) whether Stratford had special opportunities for encouraging such a School. It may be said that the proper way to learn the dances was to go straight to the 'Folk' who danced them, but that was not practicable. The only plan was to secure instruction from experts who had collected and studied the dances, and to bring students and experts together in one centre, where an individual could learn more in a week than he could in years by any other method. Was it possible to establish a standard that would be generally acceptable? The Governors were anxious that their foundations should be absolutely right and secure.

Amongst the letters of apology for absence he read was one from Mr. Reginald R. Buckley, who said: 'What is needed at Stratford is a twofold institution for the accurate transcription, revision, and teaching of an art which, though derived from homely sources, must be transmuted to the uses of our normal modern life; and a central committee in touch with all the bodies that teach folk-dancing, song, or children's games, for the purpose of organizing holiday displays and comparing notes with a view to preventing divergence.

'At different times we have had these things. Mr. Sharp is a sincere artist. He has collected and taught an enormous number of songs and dances, and he has expressed very clearly a belief and desire that from a grounding in folk-art, a sane musical appreciation will lead to better days for British music.

'Then again in the Esperance Club we have a social movement which looks more to the recreative than to the national aspect. Its aim is not so much concerned with the aspects above-mentioned as with the re-creation of the spirit that has been crushed by industrialism.

'Misguided partisans have decried the one method as pedantic, and the other as indifferent to technique.

'A conference can do much to dissipate such insane conceptions, and might even provide ways and means for these and other bodies to co-operate, and perhaps where desirable to modify divergent methods and to avoid duplicate publication and conflicting classes. But what certainly could be done would be to arrange for joint exhibitions, and a joint campaign for bringing all men and women, and especially children, to Stratford. Everyone interested in folk-art, in village drama, and eventually, I hope, in modern music and drama should be induced to co-operate with the Governors.'

Dr. Somervell stated that he knew very little about the subject and came as a learner. They had to convince people of the value of dancing. Singing used to be looked upon as dancing was regarded, but it now stands in a very high and interesting position. Boys in the street were being taught to drop the music-hall songs in favour of folk-songs. They had to aim to secure natural self-expression.

Mr. Cecil Sharp, who was greatly applauded, said that the subject attracted scientists, ethnologists, educationists, and philanthropists, and could be approached from many points of view. To his mind the most important point of view from which to approach the movement was the artistic, and they had to understand that they were first collectors and then disseminators. In this respect Mr. Sharp remarked that they were in the position of trustees engaged in a task of enormous difficulty, a task requiring at every stage the help of all those who were imbued with the idea that the things being passed on were arts. Once folk-song and folk-dance were established as arts, and practised by the whole nation and not by a part of the community, the main difficulties would be overcome. And in teaching they must try and imbue those being taught with the beauty and love of the art, and try to teach it accurately. If they got as far as that they had got as far as they could. 'Have your ideal clear, then strive to carry it through into practical effect.'

Mr. Frank Glover, of the Warwickshire County Council Education Committee, said that it was felt that present-day industrialism had crowded out the arts about which they had heard. If the proposals that were made to include the for good work in every shape or form. If reasonable room could be made in the school time-table for folk-song and dance the Board would not stand in the way. But whatever had to be done must be possible for the average teacher to impart. What was the end for which they were working? He was not clear how the movement was to grow out of the school. In the school he did not see why they should not get folk-song and dance results similar to those got from drawing and singing.

Dr. Vaughan Williams said it was important that any art, however simple, should be pure and complete. If they kept absolutely to tradition they could be quite sure they were teaching something which was spontaneous and sincere.

Mr. Sharp, rising again, said there was an evident misconception to be detected in some of the remarks made. It seemed to be supposed that so long as joy and pleasure were derived from dancing, the artistic side represented by accuracy did not matter much. But accuracy to the artist was essential in every detail; without this his art would perish.

Lady Isabel Margesson could not agree with Mr. Sharp. Young children were bored if accuracy were insisted upon. Before they acquired accuracy they needed power. This was the case in drawing.

dances in the school curriculum met with the approval of the Board of Education, his Council he felt sure would be glad to further the cause.

Mr. F. R. Benson (the well-known actor) spoke at some length. He said they were all working for a happier, merrier, saner, and a stronger England. He said that there was the old-time danger of over-emphasising the art side at the expense of the unconscious joy side. They had to feel their way between the Scylla of academic perfection and the Charybdis of the untutored joy of the savage. Miss Neal had been working in wildernesses of bricks and mortar and had brought joy and gladness to many a heart. He hoped that the Conference might result in drawing the two leaders more closely together at the shrine of the genius of the Anglo-Saxon race (Stratford-upon-Avon).

The Rev. Francis Hodgson proposed that a National Board of Folk-song and Dance should be formed, with Mr. Sharp and Miss Neal on the directorate.

Miss Neal said that she was prepared to assist in putting some such scheme into practice. She made no other remarks on the topics discussed.

Mr. L. A. Selby-Bigge, C.B., principal assistant-secretary of the Board of Education, said the Board were enthusiasts

Mrs. Mary Davies spoke warmly of the joy and enthusiasm she had found at Stratford. To her it was like the Eisteddfodic joy in Wales.

The Chairman (Mr. Flower) in summing up said very emphatically in answer to Lady Margesson that if they were to have a school and it was to be of any use surely they must in that school endeavour to instruct the teachers accurately. He asked whether there was any dissent from this proposition, and no voice was raised.

On the whole nothing very definite came of the Conference. But Mr. Flower's conclusion, just stated, seemed to clear the air. Whatever may be done 'out of school,' the training of teachers must be accurate. Mr. Sharp's firm attitude was therefore accepted as the only rational one.

It should be added, even if only briefly, that one great attraction during the term of the School was the series of performances of Shakespeare's plays at the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre by Mr. Benson's excellent company. The presentation of the plays was much enhanced by the music arranged and conducted by Dr. Vaughan Williams, who contrived to introduce many old English airs that were very acceptable. The orchestra was a small one, but it sufficed.

CONCERNING EXAMINATIONS.

By FREDERICK KITCHENER.

If we ask any musical student who is a diligent worker at the branch of so-called musical education commonly known as Strict Counterpoint, why he is making a study of it, we shall probably receive one of two answers. The first, and fortunately the more rare, of these is that he intends to follow the career of a composer, and has been told by his teacher that the mastery of strict counterpoint gives a certain grip and freedom in part-writing; the second, and by far the more common, is that he is working the exercises in order to satisfy the requirements of some musical examination.

What dreary, barren hours are those spent by the student in arranging these note-puzzles! During weary months of drudgery, while sitting up late at night puzzling over an eight-part exercise in the strictest of strict counterpoint, the idea would sometimes occur to the writer, 'What practical or artistic purpose is going to be served by all this? Is the discipline of merely moving notes about, with the most bewildering prohibitions for which there cannot be assigned any satisfactory reason, of genuine benefit?' Really, one fails to see that any musical sense or feeling is needed in order to work at these exercises, as required in advanced musical examinations. Moreover, one cannot conceive of any musical period in which they could possibly have been beneficial. Of course, years of hard study at real and genuine counterpoint are necessary to every musician who intends to be thorough. But let us have counterpoint that can be applied to some useful purpose, not a collection of note-puzzles that are loathed while being worked and put away as detestable things at the earliest opportunity.

Can anyone find in Bach, the greatest of all contrapuntists, any excuse for the continued stiffness and ultra-rigidity of contrapuntal exercises? Is it not of extreme significance that in Cherubini's treatise on counterpoint, no quotation from Bach is given? We are often told, 'Oh, yes, but then Bach was a genius; and genius sets rules at defiance. Ordinary persons must follow accepted ways.' These accepted ways, be it noted, are found upon inspection to be ways that obtained before 1650. The fact that genius continually sets certain 'rules' at defiance would appear to most logical persons to be the most damning proof of their inutility. Great literary giants do not break the rules of grammar which hold good in their time; for example, George Meredith, our last great writer, was most particular as to the wording and style of his sentences, though these were often very involved and complex. Yet in music a different state of things prevails; and we find text-book maxims, which are theoretically supposed to hold good in our own time, flagrantly broken in almost every bar of the music of such men as Elgar, Sinding, and Reger, to name three representative modern composers of entirely different modes of musical thought.

Are modern musicians who enter for musical degrees or diplomas supposed to ignore altogether the music of their own time? Is it taken for granted that they do not know what is going on in the world of music; or is it assumed that some of them who complain of the uselessness and antiquity of the exercises set them in musical examinations do so from some wicked ulterior motive, such as a desire to shirk hard work? Many enthusiastic musicians would enter for such examinations with pleasure and eagerness, could it be made clear to them that in making the necessary preparations they were not spending their time in utter waste, so far as any really artistic purpose is concerned. A genuine musician loves hard work; but, if possessed of an average amount of common sense, he does want to know that this work will serve some useful purpose beyond the means of his being allowed to affix certain letters, or collections of letters, of the alphabet to his surname. If a musical examination is not practical—that is, having some bearing upon and some connection with the kind of music that the examinee will most use, and exist for the most part in the atmosphere of, during his musical career—wherein is its utility? Some may affirm: 'The practicalness of the examination lies in the fact that success in it actually secures the privilege of being given a University degree, or diploma of a great musical institution, independently of the work done in order to gain the privilege. The public will be satisfied when it sees the letters, outward and visible signs of the inward and spiritual (musical) graces assumed to belong to the graduate or diplomee, and will not trouble itself about the means taken to obtain them.' Granted that a musical degree or diploma is a passport to public favour, the general public being admittedly careless and ignorant in such matters, must it be concluded that when the work done in order to obtain this passport is seen to be of a kind never likely to be employed in any ordinary musical capacity of any kind whatever, musicians must perforce remain content with matters as they are, and not try to get things altered? That there is widespread dissatisfaction with the present state of affairs is evident from a perusal of many responsible English musical journals. Men who have themselves obtained their degrees of Mus. Bac. or Mus. Doc. write in no uncertain language of the amount of useless and archaic work that they have been obliged to undergo, and of the hidebound, stilted, antiquated methods of the examiners.

The writer, having been a diligent reader of the Musical Times for sixteen years, remembers a discussion on counterpoint which went on in its pages. The question concerned the progressions allowed or disallowed in the working-out, in four parts, of a certain Canto Fermo. At a point in the discussion, the Canto was submitted to the late Josef Rheinberger, who certainly could not have been accused of undue leanings to ultra-modernity, in order that he might send some characteristic specimens of his own workings-out, as done by himself and his numerous pupils, thereby giving the discussion the weight of the opinion of an accepted Continental authority. Rheinberger's workings-out proved to be of a freedom which would not be tolerated by any English musical examiner. Upon these examples being shown to an English gentleman who was an examiner (whether for degrees or diplomas, or for both, the writer cannot say), he remarked, 'This is not counterpoint at all; it is music!' Does not this speak for itself?

Surely an English musical degree or diploma should be a reward of practical proficiency—a guarantee that a person is, in the opinion of men who have themselves become well-known in the world of music, efficient and capable enough to follow publicly a certain branch or certain branches of musical art, in order, generally speaking, to gain a livelihood. But that such a degree or diploma is in itself an artistic end cannot be reasonably maintained. There is a great danger, to a certain not uncommon type of musician, that a degree or diploma may be considered as an end in itself, instead of a means to an end; and after success in obtaining it, no effort is made to rise to higher things, artistically speaking. It is often urged in favour of musical examinations that they stimulate to unwonted exertion, and to a high pitch of proficiency, many who without such a stimulus would either never work at all or would fail to attain so high a standard. But if a musician is worth anything, his motive for work will come from within, and will not be influenced by any exterior goads to exertion. Neither is it so very desirable a thing that a great many persons without any pronounced musical gift should be encouraged to persevere in that course of mechanical toil necessary to be undergone in order to pass an examination, to the end that they may join the already overcrowded ranks of the musical profession. The utility of musical examinations, when properly conducted, will lie in this: that they will form a kind of guarantee, to a public in the main unmusical, that a certain degree of proficiency has been attained to. Trained and competent musicians, when sitting in judgment on the work of another musician, seldom take into consideration his possession or non-possession of degrees or diplomas; a Doctor's gown is not allowed to cloak a slovenly performance or a dull mechanical composition.

Among the general mass of the English public, however, it is found that the possession of 'letters after the name' confers a certain distinction, however little such distinction may be deserved. Let us take one notable instance. With all the virtues and gifts possessed by the English clergy as a body, appreciation of music is not, perhaps, specially prominent among these. The clergy have a great influence upon English music, inasmuch as they are responsible for the selection of organists, upon whom the musical life of some places, especially smaller ones, almost entirely depends. Ninety-nine times out of a hundred the clergyman will prefer to have an organist with 'letters after his name.' Is such a man invariably the best? Not at all. In every department of English music, the unexamined men have been leaders. Yet the unexamined man, unless extremely strong—and even if he be extremely strong, in the earlier stages of his career—must be mentally placed, by the ill-informed, second to the graduate or diplomee. He may be exceptionally brilliant, erudite, gifted, and industrious; but to most of the public the lowest kind of diplomee is his superior. How long are the musicians of Great Britain going to tolerate a condition of affairs which permits of such a paradox as this?

Some will say 'How can matters be improved?' Surely they can be improved in many ways. First of all, the science and art of counterpoint needs to be brought into touch with modern thought. It is much to be wished that such a lengthy, exhaustive, and up-to-date treatise on counterpoint as that by the Russian composer Tanéiéw could be translated into English and used as a text-book in England. It might then displace the obsolete methods of Cherubini's treatise, with which the writer is well acquainted, having worked through the book during a period of three years.

Harmony, again, needs to be considered as a scientific classification of chords and progressions, not as a matter of a few simple chords adorned with bunches of figures, and called 'figured bass.'

What is wanted is not less hard work and difficulty, but more. This, however, must be musical, not arithmetical; practical, not useless; and of the 20th century, not of the 16th or 17th. There is no doubt that such a levelling-up of the practice of music in general, and of musical examinations in particular, would be an immense boon to the musicians of the country, in creating fresh artistic zeal, energy, and enthusiasm on the part of those (and they are many) who now feel that things in this direction are not as they should be.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BOURNEMOUTH.

The last week in July saw the resumption of the orchestral concerts after the annual vacation of the members of the band, the usual Thursday afternoon Symphony Concert being directed on July 25 by Mr. F. King-Hall, the leader, in the continued absence of Mr. Dan Godfrey. The principal item in the programme was Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony, and the soloist was Mr. Charles Whittaker (a violinist of the orchestra). Mr. Godfrey returned in time for the concert on August 1, showing all his accustomed resourcefulness in the performance of a programme that included Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, a work for which our conductor has a particular regard, Brahms's 'Academic' Overture, Edward German's graceful incidental music to 'Romeo and Juliet,' and a pleasing Concertstück for flute and orchestra by Hofmann, the latter item being skilfully performed by Mr. Jean Gennin, a member of the orchestra. On August 8 a Beethoven programme was submitted, the scheme including the 'Leonore' No. 3 Overture, Rondino for wood-wind and horns, Turkish March from 'The Ruins of Athens,' Romance in F for violin, and the fifth Symphony. The large audience present was rewarded with some very sound playing, which culminated in a conspicuously successful performance of the Symphony. Yet another member of the orchestra, Mr. Algernon Holland, was the soloist in the Romance, his interpretation being both intelligent and tasteful.

We have had visits from 'Jimmy' Glover and Miss Marie Hall within the last few weeks. The former directed the Municipal Orchestra through a selection of pieces that was notable for its variety, ranging from an excerpt from Coleridge-Taylor's 'Nero' music to a Fantasia on nautical airs arranged by the conductor.

Miss Hall attracted an enormous audience to the Winter Gardens, and the genuine enthusiasm which she provoked was pleasant to witness.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

During the last few weeks music has been undergoing the 'rest cure' in the Three Towns, for with the exception of the routine of popular concert-party performances on the Pier, and band performances on the Hoe and Pier, only one event has to be recorded. This was a violin and pianoforte recital given on July 25, at Plymouth College, by Miss Constance Pinwill and Mrs. Caunter. A Bach Suite for the two instruments and another in four movements by Vieuxtemps enclosed a programme which included also two movements from the G minor Violin concerto of Max Bruch and pieces for the same instrument by Sauret, Svendsen, and Ries. Mrs. Caunter's solo (pianoforte) was a 'Thème et étude' by Thalberg.

The scheme mapped out by the committee of Dr. Weekes's Orchestral Society for performance during the coming season makes quite a definite departure from past work, for several works new to the district are announced. The Symphony in G minor of Kalinnikov, played at the last Bristol Festival four years ago, will be heard for the first time in Plymouth, the overtures 'Les Dragons de Villars' by Maillart, and 'The little Minister' by Mackenzie, and a 'Rhapsody' by Mr. Walter Weekes (co-conductor) will at least be unfamiliar to the audience. The Misses Smith have issued their prospective programme of Musical Matinées for 1912-13, a prominent feature in which is the appearance of the Motto String Quartet. Visits are promised by Messrs. Leonard Borwick, Plunket Greene, and Max Mossel.

DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

The string combination of the Royal Marine Band (Stonehouse), conducted by Mr. J. W. Newton, gave a much appreciated concert at Tiverton on July 25. Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony and some of the Brahms 'Hungarian' Dances were well played, and Mr. C. G. Pike artistically played the solo part in an effective Romance by Bargiel for 'cello and orchestra.

On July 31, the choir from St. Andrew's (Plymouth) Church visited Milton Abbot and sang choruses, anthems, and solos on the occasion of the opening of the organ by their organist, Mr. H. Moreton, who gave a recital.

An epoch-marking event in the history of Torquay has been achieved in the formation of a municipal orchestra which will perform regularly in the new Pavilion. Torquay in this matter leads the way in Devonshire, and is the only town in the two counties of Devon and Cornwall with a municipal string combination. The conductor appointed by the Torquay authorities is Mr. Basil Hindenburg, who has under his control an orchestra of twenty-five members. At the opening concert on August 17 they played pieces by Weber (overture, 'Oberon'), Délibes, Sullivan, Offenbach, and Elgar (march, 'Pomp and circumstance'), with creditable success.

Morris and other characteristic dances and old English songs and folk-tunes formed the major part of an entertainment at Brixham on July 31, under the direction of Mrs. F. Brett Young, assisted by the Misses Tolchard and Stevens. Axe Vale Musical Society achieved a success at Seaton on August 8, in a performance of 'H.M.S. Pinafore,' the performers numbering over sixty.

Exeter Oratorio Society have decided to perform 'Samson,' 'The Ascension,' and 'A tale of Old Japan,' during next season. The second-named work is composed by Dr. H. J. Edwards, who shares the post of conductor of the Society with Dr. D. J. Wood.

Quite a large number of members of the musical profession and amateurs met at Bideford on August 10 for a fortnight's holiday, consisting of lectures, concerts, excursions, sports, and social intercourse. The committee, of which Dr. W. H. Hadow was president, and of which Dr. A. Somervell, Dr. Percy Buck, and Dr. C. Harford Lloyd were vice-presidents, with Messrs. Percy A. Scholes and J. G. Lawrence as hon. secs., secured Edgehill College as the house of residence, and many visitors had to be accommodated in the neighbourhood. The list of lecturers included Mr. Albert Visetti, Mr. G. C. Ashton-Jonson, Mons. Michel D. Calvocoressi, Messrs. Stewart Macpherson, P. A. Scholes, and Mrs. Kennedy Fraser.

CORNWALL.

Mr. C. E. Juleff (Weston-super-Mare) gave an organ recital in Ladock Parish Church on August 1; on the following day the organ in Helston Parish Church was 're-opened' after extensive enlargement and rebuilding by Messrs. Hele & Co., by Dr. Monk, of Truro Cathedral; and on August 8, Mr. Dennis (Redruth) gave a recital on a newly-built organ in Frogpool Wesleyan Church.

The respectable sum of £30 10s. was raised by a concert given at Looe, on August 13, by a party of visitors, in aid of the Local Nursing Fund. Mr. Herbert Parsons (Clifton) was responsible for the programme, to which he contributed pianoforte solos; the Looe Male Quartet sang 'In absence' and 'How can I bear to leave thee' with much beauty of effect; the vocalists were the Misses Pauline Hook and Hazel Gray; Mr. Frank S. Gardiner contributed violin solos.

Pavilions for concerts have been opened at Penzance and Newquay during the last month.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

Last winter our city's musical life and experiences were enriched by the visits of the Quinlan and Denhof Opera companies; during the coming season, whilst losing one of these, we are to enjoy the luxury of two orchestral concerts every week for six months, thanks to the advent of the new organization known as the 'Brand Lane Symphony Orchestra,' which will give smoking 'Proms.' under Sir Henry Wood on those Saturday nights when our Free Trade Hall platform is not occupied by Mr. Simon Speelman's orchestra.

Both these organizations are early in the field with fully-drafted programmes for the winter's work.

When this 'Brand Lane' Orchestra was mooted, sceptics doubted whether a first-rate band was practicable, seeing that it was impossible to draw upon the members of the Hallé Orchestra, and many orchestral players in South Lancashire had other permanent engagements.

But even a cursory glance at the names of the eighty players, given in the advance prospectus of these new concerts, dispels all fears on that score. Mr. Arthur Catterall leads, the principal wood-wind players come from Queen's Hall, and the rank and file reveal many well-known names not hitherto identified, perhaps, with first-class orchestras, but most capable players for all that. A comparison of Sir Henry Wood's draft-programmes for this series with those of his more famous Queen's Hall 'Proms.' naturally reveals many points of similarity. Last season did much to enable Manchester to make up leeway in the matter of music known elsewhere, but unfamiliar in Cottonopolis; but there is yet much worth knowing, and Sir Henry is judiciously introducing works such as Liszt's Fantasia on Beethoven's 'Ruins of Athens' (with Mr. Egon Petri at the pianoforte), Percy Grainger's 'Mock Morris' for strings and 'Molly on the Shore,' the 'Rosenkavalier' valse of Strauss, Tchaikovsky's 'Poltava,' and Boellmann's 'Fantasie Dialogue' for organ and orchestra. So attractive orchestrally, this series does not lag behind in the matter of vocal or instrumental soloists, Mr. Brand Lane's past reputation for enterprise in this department and his ripe experience standing him in good stead. Mr. Lane's new series does not mean the curtailment of the long-established concerts at which his choir, and soloists of the Melba, Ysaye, Backhaus, Theodore Byard type (to take a few random names), have performed, but as previously noted in connection with the 'Harrison' series, orchestral work is seen to be a growing interest even with what was originally a purely 'ballad concert' type of audience. It is good to be able to record progress along such lines. To judge from some critiques in Manchester journalism, there would appear to be a fairly prevalent idea that Sir Henry Wood's forte lies in the direction of orchestral work of lesser dimensions. True, here he has played little (if any) Wagner and not a great deal of Brahms or Beethoven, by which Manchester swears and judges all visiting conductors; but October 28 will see Sir Henry in charge of over a dozen Wagnerian items in the true old Richter manner. For this alone thanks are due to Mr. Lane.

To anybody conversant with Choral Society management, or even of orchestral propaganda, in towns not of the first magnitude—outside such as Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds or Glasgow—it has long been plain that there was an unfilled demand for a first-class orchestra conducted with the highest efficiency, that should not be burdened with the big expense of long-distance railway journeys, which add so materially to the cost, nor with the fee of a 'star' conductor. The Brand Lane band, with its new conductor, offers as feasible a solution of this problem as we are ever likely to see, in the North at any rate. Manchester is the hub around which revolves so much besides mere commercial and political life; convenience of situation enables it to serve the numberless centres of North Lancashire and the West Riding, as well as Derbyshire, Staffordshire, and North Wales, so it is with no surprise that one finds the agricultural market town of Penrith, ninety miles north of Manchester, but only little more than two hours' rail journey on the main line to Scotland, availing itself of the Wood-Brand Lane combination for a two days' Festival on November 20 and 21. It will cost £300 as it is, but it is doubtful whether such a combination of conductor and band has hitherto been available at the price. As noted in last month's issue, the active spirit of Penrith music retires to Belfast ere long, and this will be the last occasion on which he will be associated with his old Society.

Mr. Speelman's Promenade Concerts open on October 5. Unlike Sir Henry Wood, who has avoided symphonic works in this his first scheme, Mr. Speelman has included a few, and as usual the final concert will be of a plébiscitary nature. The veteran, Auguste van Biene, one-time leader of the Hallé 'cellos, plays on December 14, and Miss Say Ashworth's Ancoats Girls' Institute has also been engaged.

The Hallé Orchestra is to tour Scotland for a week, from February 24 to March 1, and this will necessitate a break in the sequence of the 'Proms.' orchestral concerts, as all the members of this orchestra are Hallé men, and presumably their first duty is to the Hallé management. Other arrangements will have to be made for March 1, and it will be interesting to see how the usual Thursday night Hallé concert in that week will be dealt with during the Orchestra's absence in Scotland. Curiosity on this point can only be satisfied by the issue of the Hallé prospectus, which has been delayed by this and other changes in the original forecast of the season's work.

The Quinlan Opera is due to enter upon its Manchester season on October 7 at the Palace Theatre. Puccini's 'La Bohême,' Charpentier's 'Louise' (in English), 'Figaro,' and 'Lohengrin' are all to be given, but fuller details are not yet available.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

BRIGHTON.—On July 31 the Brighton Municipal Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Lyell-Taylor, introduced to the public a new orchestral tone-poem by Mr. Bruce Steane, entitled 'Grimaldi.' The work is a clever and interesting musical sketch of the life of the famous clown, with pronounced emphasis on the tragic side. It was excellently received by a large audience, and the composer is to be congratulated on his success.

CHRISTCHURCH (NEW ZEALAND).—A notable example of the excellence to which the Christchurch Musical Union has advanced under the guidance of Dr. Bradshaw was given on June 25, in the form of a performance of Sullivan's 'The martyr of Antioch,' that roused exceptional admiration. The choral singing had broad expressiveness as well as high efficiency. The solo portions were capably sung by Miss Rita Lyons, Miss Allison, Mr. Frank Graham, Mr. Charles Clarkson, and Mr. E. J. Johnson.

Durban.—'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'The death of Minnehaha' were performed by the Musical Association with great success on July 8 at the Town Hall. The choir of 150 singers and the orchestra of forty players were under the direction of Mr. Frank Proudman, the Borough organist and musical director to the Corporation. The soloists were Miss Emily Breare, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Charles Knowles.

Harrogate.—At the Symphony Concert on August 14, the programme included the 'Britannia' Overture, the 'Benedictus,' and the air-de-ballet 'La Savannah,' all by Sir Alexander Mackenzie, who conducted the performances. Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony and other works were conducted by Mr. Julian Clifford. The soloist was Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees, who played a violoncello concerto by Lalo.

Hobart (Tasmania).—The third Subscription Concert given by the Hobart Orpheus Club during the season took place at the Town Hall on June 24. The eight numbers contributed to the programme by the choral body included Dudley Buck's 'In absence,' Sullivan's 'The long day closes' and 'The beleaguered,' Bantock's 'Boot and saddle,' and German's 'O peaceful night.' Mr. P. Planche-Plummer conducted with ability, and agreeable solos were given by Miss Eva Creese, Miss Madge Jacklyn, Mr. C. Pitman, and Mr. C. E. Tibbs. Lady Barron and suite were present as members of a large audience.

Foreign Notes.

ALTENBURG.

Among the interesting works heard at the Symphony Concerts of the Court Orchestra, have been Mozart's Concerto for flute and harp, Bruckner's 'Romantic' Symphony, a Canzonetta and Valse romantique, by Sibelius, a Symphonic-poem, 'King Lear,' by Fritz Theil, and a Scherzo by Erwin Lendvai.——At the concerts of the Künstlerklause, Borodin's Symphony in E flat, Berwald's 'Symphonie singulière,' and Volkmann's now rarely-heard Serenade in F major for string orchestra have been played.

BASEL.

Reger's 'Requiem,' set to Hebbel's poem, has been performed by the Liedertafel (to whom the work is dedicated) with considerable success.

BAYREUTH.

This year's Festival opened on July 22 with an excellent performance of 'Die Meistersinger,' under the direction of Dr. Richter, who conducted with wonderful freshness and all his old mastery. The 'Ring des Nibelungen' and 'Parsifal' were given under the conductorship of Herr Balling and Dr. Muck. The stage-management was entirely in the hands of Herr Siegfried Wagner, Madame Cosima Wagner having now retired from active participation in the productions. Among the artists taking part were a number of the 'old guard' (who evidently do not think of capitulating), including Madame Reuss-Belce, Madame Schumann-Heink, Madame Gulbranson, Messrs. Ernest van Dyck, Knüpfer, &c. Among the younger acquisitions Madame Bahr-Mildenburg, Madame Saltzmann-Stevens, Madame Hafgren-Waag, Messrs. Hensel, Mayr, Soomer, Breuer, Schultz, and Urlus were perhaps the most successful. It is said that next year (the centenary of Wagner's birth) no festival performances are to take place.

BERLIN.

The prospectuses of most of the well-known concert-undertakings have been issued. Among the novelties to be performed at the Philharmonic Concerts, under the direction of Professor Arthur Nikisch, are Korngold's 'Ouverture zu einem Schauspiel,' Richard Mandl's 'Ouverture zu einem Gascognischen Ritterspiel,' a 'Karnevals ouverture,' by Walter Braunfels, Joseph Holbrooke's scherzo, 'Queen Mab,' an orchestral burleske, 'Max und Moritz,' by Mrazek, and Sgambati's D major Symphony.——At the orchestral concerts conducted by Herr Oscar Fried, Mahler's ninth Symphony (which was recently produced at the Vienna Musical Festival) and the 'Lied von der Erde,' Delius's 'Lebenstanz,' Alfred Casalla's 'Italien,' Reznicek's 'Schlemihl' and Arnold Schönberg's 'Gurrelieder' are to be played. The Singakademie promises Handel's 'Deborah' (for the first time), Hugo Kaun's 126th Psalm, 'Hymnus an Amor,' by E. E. Taubert, the 'Wanderers' Sturmlied by Richard Strauss, and Bruckner's 150th Psalm.——Siegmund von Hausegger's choral work 'Die Weihe der Nacht' is to be produced by the Philharmonic Choir. Verdi's four 'Pezzi Sacri' also figure in their programme.——At the Royal Opera, Richard Strauss's new opera 'Ariadne auf Naxos' is to be given. The following works will be revived with new settings: Wagner's 'Ring' and 'Tristan und Isolde,' Gluck's 'Iphigenia in Tauris,' Auber's 'Masaniello,' and Rossini's 'Barber.'——In September a new four-act opera, 'König Harlekin,' by Mr. G. H. Clutsam, is to be produced at the Kurfürstenoper.

BREMEN.

The novelties to be given at the Municipal Theatre during the coming season, include Strauss's 'Ariadne auf Naxos,' Wolf-Ferrari's 'Der Schmuck der Madonna,' Kienzl's 'Kuhreigen,' Waltershausen's 'Oberst Chabert,' 'Der Fünfuhrtee,' by Blumer, and Max Wolff's 'Das Heisse Eisen.' Verdi's 'Falstaff' and Tchaikovsky's 'Eugen Onégin' are to to revived.

COBLENZ.

Commerzienrath Wegeler has presented 100,000 Marks (£5,000) to create a fund, the interest of which is to be devoted to assisting the local concert Societies to perform rarely-heard compositions that are expensive to produce.

ESSEN.

Under the direction of Herr Hermann Abendroth, Hausegger's 'Natursymphonie,' Max Reger's 'Konzert im alten Stil,' Max Schillings's symphonic-phantasy, 'Seemorgen,' a Symphonic-overture by August Scharrer, and a Concert-overture by Siks will be played during the coming season for the first time at the concerts of the Essener Musikverein.

HAGEN.

Elgar's overture, 'In the South,' and his 'Introduction and Allegro' for string orchestra, were recently given for the first time under the direction of Herr Robert Largs; who also introduced Straesser's Symphony in G major, and the tone-poems 'Minnehaha' and 'Hiawatha,' by Hugo Kaun.

MANNHEIM.

A concert given by Herr Marcus Stahl was devoted to works by the French composer, Louis Lacombe (1818-84). The programme contained the Symphonic-poem, 'Sappho,' the dramatic scenes 'Sur la plage' and 'L'abandonné,' and a six-part chorus, 'Au pied d'un crucifix,' with soprano solo, violin solo, and orchestra.

MUNICH.

The programmes of the special Symphony Concerts that commenced on August 14 include the following works by contemporary composers: a 'Tragic Overture' by Boehe, Dukas's Scherzo 'L'apprenti sorcier,' Elgar's Variations, Hausegger's 'Wieland der Schmied,' the Overture to 'Käthchen von Heilbronn,' by Pfitzner, Reger's Variations on a theme by Hiller, the Prologue to 'King Œdipus,' by Schillings, and Richard Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel,' 'Don Juan,' and 'Symphonia Domestica.' Mahler's seventh Symphony and Hugo Wolf's 'Italian' Serenade are also to be played. The conductor is Herr Ferdinand Löwe.

NÜRNBERG.

The eighth 'Deutsches Sängerbundesfest' took place in this town during July 27 to 31. No fewer than 38,000 singers took part in the performances, which were given in an enormous hall specially built for the purpose. Sometimes 15,000 singers sang at the same time. Tone effects are said to have been obtained with surprising success; a remarkable effect was secured, for instance, by the soft 'falsetto' of 4,000 tenors. Among the conductors were Messrs. Förstler, Hirsch, Meyer-Oldensleben, Schmidt, Scheider and Wohlgemuth. The compositions presented included 'Die Allmacht' (Schubert-Liszt), a 'Morgenlied' by Rietz, 'Kreuzritter's Heimkunft,' by Kienzl, the Pilgrims' Chorus from Wagner's 'Tannhäuser,' Speidel's 'Im tiefsten Wald,' and Bruckner's 'Um Mitternacht.'

OSTEND.

At the annual Belgian Festival on July 21 the following works by Belgian composers were given at the Kursaal:—Peter Benoit's 'Moederspraak,' 'Filips van Artevelde' by Gevaert, and two children's cantatas—'Kindervreugd,' by Paul Gilson, and 'Nos Carillons,' by Léon Du Bois.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

At the conclusion of the Midsummer Term of this College, on July 27, the following awards were made by the Director and Board of Professors:—Council Exhibitions to John S. Robson (organ); Dorothy Gurney, Enid Knight-Bruce, and Jessie Stewart (violin); Percival Kirby (composition); Olive M. Sturgess (singing). The London Musical Society's prize for singing to Ivor G. Walters (scholar); Messrs. W. E. Hill & Son's prize of a violin, bow and case, and the Worshipful Company of Musicians' silver medal to Eugene A. Goossens (scholar).

THE GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

The following students obtained the highest mark-totals in Honours in the examination for Associateship set by the School, and have been awarded the following medals for the year 1912:—Gold medal, Helen M. Rising (pianoforte); silver medal, Wilfred H. Richardson (pianoforte); bronze medal, John E. Hope (accompanying a Church service). The following awards were also made:—The Lord Mayor's Prize for soprano vocalists, to Lottie Minns and Marie L. Prismall (divided); the Lady Mayoress's Prize for pianoforte students, to Vera E. Wise; the Sheriff's Prize for soprano vocalists, to Winnie Browne; the Sheriff's Prize for contralto vocalists, to Blodwen Norton and Marjorie Ayling (divided); the Chairman's Prize for tenor vocalists, to Noel Cummings; the Knill Challenge Cup, with silver medal, for an eminently deserving student, to M. Gordon Burgess; the Knight Prize for bass vocalists to Carl True; the Tillie gold medal, for a distinguished lady violin student, to Olive Kershaw; the Lady Jenkinson Prize for pianoforte students, to Eric Zardo; the Alexander Prize for elocution students, to Winnie Browne; the Enoch Singing Prize to Reginald Herbert; the Maude Willby Prize for violin students, to Rebe Kussmann and George R. Cockerill; the Pearse Morrison Memorial Prize for enunciation in singing, to Carl True; the Max Hecht Scholarship for British vocalists studying German classic song, to Christian Oberst; the Dove Memorial prize for general industry, to Winnie Browne; the Libotton Memorial Prize for violoncellists, to G. Kingston Jones.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The following awards have been made:—Scholarships to Dora Bianchi, Frank Ashton Lane, Alice Mary Lees, Evelyn Mary Moore, Jessie Mary Parker, Evelyn Goudie, Edith Ellen Hillard, Dorothy Blanche Nunn, Yvonne Pewny, Donald Ivo Priestley, Leotine Pauline Barthelmeh, Maud Alice A. Kerr, Eric Greiffenhagen; free tuition to Stanley Arthur Wright, Sidney Herbert Sheppard, Walter Middleton Witherick, Herbert Clibbens. The following were commended:—Alfred R. H. Abbott, Marguerite Mary Gill, and Marion M. Smith.

THE COMING SEASON.

St. Margaret's Musical Society (Rev. Jocelyn Perkins) will open with 'Elijah.' South-West Choral Society (Mr. A. R. Saunders) will perform 'Hiawatha,' Parts I. and II., 'The Flag of England,' 'King Olaf,' and 'The Messiah.' Halifax Choral Society (Mr. H. A. Fricker) will perform Berlioz's 'Faust,' 'The Messiah,' 'A tale of Old Japan,' Liszt's 13th Psalm, Brahms's 'Triumphlied.'

A popular welcome was given to Mrs. Mary Layton and her ladies' choir of sixty voices on the occasion of their concert at Fulham Town Hall on July 18. The programme included the three test-pieces with which the choir had won the highest honours at the Paris Competitions—namely, Laurent de Rillé's 'The Exiles,' Weelkes's 'The Nightingale,' and Marchetti's 'Ave Maria.' The remainder included Vaughan Williams's 'Sound Sleep,' Brahms's 'The Death of Trenar,' and a new part-song, 'The Quest,' by C. B. Rootham, with accompaniment for pianoforte and strings. This proved a work of considerable merit and interest, and it won a cordial reception, which the composer acknowledged. Miss Margaret Layton and other vocalists contributed to an excellent programme.

A new use for precocious musical talent has been discovered by Miss Blanche Cobacker, a juvenile pianist living at Denver, Colorado. During one of her public performances the lights went out, and a panic was imminent. The child, however, went on playing in the dark, with the result that confidence and order were restored. Miss Cobacker's gifts are so remarkable that a writer in the Denver Times is forced to seek a psychological explanation. 'Is it Atavism or re-incarnation?' he asks. At present the little lady is studying under Dr. James Gower, of Denver, once a resident at Sutton, in Surrey.

Miss Stella Carol, the fifteen-year-old singer discovered by Madame Amy Sherwin, took the principal part in a concert given at the Crystal Palace on July 27, and charmed a large audience. In the mad scene from 'Lucia di Lammermoor' she was joined by Mr. Louis Boschman as flautist. Miss Dorothy Webster, Mr. Frazer Gange (vocalists), Mr. Luiz Figuéras (violoncellist), Mr. Clement Harvey (pianist) also contributed to the programme.

The Dunedin Association, founded in November, 1911, with the object of stimulating interest in Scottish music and poetry, has now over 600 members. The monthly meetings of the Society have been uniformly successful, and it is now proposed to issue a magazine and to give important concerts of Scottish music on January 31 (orchestral) and March 7 (choral).

Considerable success has attended the activities of Miss Alys Bateman as a concert-singer during the holiday season. On August 7 Miss Bateman sang at Buxton, on August 10 at Llandudno, on August 14 at Colwyn Bay, and on August 18 at Tynemouth. On every occasion large audiences were roused to enthusiasm.

Mr. J. Lamont Galbraith, late of Glasgow, now residing in Richmond, Va., U.S.A., has been successful in gaining second prize in Class I. (Concert Song) in the recent 'Etude' Prize Song Contest. There were close on 1,500 manuscripts sent in for this competition.

We are glad to receive, from time to time, copies of the Indian Music Journal, the contents of which dive deeply into the mysteries of the strange world of Indian music. The issue for March-April contains two contributions by Mrs. Maud Mann (Maud McCarthy).

Mr. William Holmes, formerly conductor of the West London Choral Association, has been appointed musical director of the Passmore Edwards Settlement, Tavistock Place, Tavistock Square, W.C.

A further series of orchestral concerts for young people is announced by Miss Gwynne Kimpton. They will take place at Æolian Hall on October 12, November 23, December 14, January 25, and February 22. On each occasion Mr. Stewart Macpherson will make introductory remarks on the music in the programme.

Mr. Gerald W. Crawford, a prominent Edinburgh musician, has been elected a member of the Town Council. He is perhaps the first Councillor in Edinburgh who has had even a passing acquaintance with musical art.

The annual meeting of the Welsh Folk-song Society is announced to take place at Wrexham on September 4, during the National Eisteddfod.

Dr. Istel, of Munich, has discovered the MS. of a double fugue by Richard Wagner, written, it appears, about 1831-32 as a contrapuntal exercise.

Answers to Correspondents.

O.V. asks us how far the 'shaking and quavering of the voice,' indulged in by so many vocalists, 'is considered by good musicians to be an embellishment in songs, glees, anthems, hymns, &c.' We have only to answer that this distressing manner of singing—a disease, we may call it—is so far as we are aware universally condemned. It gives pleasure to no one. There is some justification for the use of tremulousness when it is the appropriate expression of grief and great emotion; but when a whole song is, as it were, tarred by the same brush, it becomes simply tiresome, irritating and absurd. Many well-known singers unfortunately employ the practice, and this induces other singers to suppose it is the correct thing. Some singers adopt the style unconsciously, and indignantly deny the fault.

ORGANO.—(1) As far as we know the Variations were written for the pianoforte. (2) Among Sinding's most popular pianoforte works are his fifteen Caprices, Op. 44, in five books, at 3*s.* each; his 'Mélodies Mignonnes,' Op. 25, price 2*s.* 6*d.*; his Sonata, Op. 91, price 5*s.* They can all be supplied by Messrs. Novello.

REX.—(1) Brahms's 'Wie bist du meine Königin' is usually sung at about ♩ = 63, but not very strictly. (2) In singing semiquaver runs a slight accent on the first of each group of four defines the rhythm, and is not inartistic. The same may be said as to differentiation of the pulse-accents from one another. But unless it is all contrived to sound very natural, such accents can be inartistic. Some teachers like pupils to be able to sing runs almost without any perceptible accent. (3) 𝅗𝅥 = 132 is a virtuoso pace for 'I fain would hide' from Weber's 'Euryanthe'; but the composer asks for 'Vivace feroce.' You must temper the pace a little if this is too fast for your voice.

MASON (Tonbridge).—Bonnet's 'Etude de Concert' is one of twelve pieces that are published in one volume at 8*s.* The volume can be supplied by Messrs. Novello.

ALBERT FAIR.—Gounod's 'Lo, the children of the Hebrews,' from Messrs. Bayley & Ferguson, Great Marlborough Street; 'Hail, gladdening Light,' from Messrs. Weekes, Hanover Square.

F. C. T.—The setting is probably that of Frederick Clay, published by Messrs. Weekes.

M. F.—See Spain's 'Equal Temperament' in Novello's Primer Series.

["No English-speaking country or colony with so much as a solitary musical society is unacquainted with the music of Mr. Gaul."—Birmingham Daily Gazette and Express, April 11, 1910.]

MR. GAUL will be pleased to forward to the Colonies or any foreign country the Orchestral Parts (on loan) of any of his works.

COMPOSITIONS BY ALFRED R. GAUL

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-SEVENTH THOUSAND.

1. THE HOLY CITY.

A SACRED CANTATA
FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTEENTH THOUSAND.

2. THE TEN VIRGINS

A SACRED CANTATA
FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

"Will be heartily welcomed by all who love the art of music."
—Newcastle Journal.

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard, and will assuredly be placed among the foremost compositions of this kind by present-day writers . . . treated in a thoroughly artistic manner . . . a perfect wealth of melody and striking individuality of style."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"Works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—the 'Holy City,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'The Ten Virgins.'"—Newcastle Daily Journal.

"BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE CHOIR.—The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to encore every other number of the work. That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

Produced with great success by the Birmingham Festival Choral Society.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. FORTIETH THOUSAND.

3. JOAN OF ARC

AN HISTORICAL CANTATA
FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

"Few Cantatas are as rich in chaste melodies, charming choruses, and exquisite orchestration as Alfred R. Gaul's 'Joan of Arc,' performed by the Vocal Association in the Guildhall."—The Western News.

"Must enhance the high reputation of its composer."—Liverpool Courier.

"The inspiration of a highly-refined musician. . . . The Cantata is even a more masterly and beautiful work than 'The Holy City.'"—Huddersfield Examiner.

"No more charming Cantata than 'Joan of Arc' could have been chosen. It abounds in delicious music. There is not a tedious note in it."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Chronicle.

"Gives the listener a vivid and realistic impression, its attractiveness being continuous instead of spasmodic."—Bradford Observer.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. TWENTY-FOURTH THOUSAND.

4. PASSION SERVICE

(Only published in Vocal Score)

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively: 'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' Mr. Gaul's work will undoubtedly greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed. The work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul has to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

Arranged for a limited Orchestra—namely, Strings, 2 Flutes, 2 Clarinets, 2 Cornets, Bass Trombone or Euphonium, and Kettledrums.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTH THOUSAND.

5. THE PRINCE OF PEACE

A SACRED CANTATA
FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

THE WORDS SELECTED FROM HOLY SCRIPTURE.

"No man knows better than Mr. Gaul how to write for voices. . . . Throughout the work we have spontaneousness, elegance, attractiveness, in short, a never-ending charm."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Is indeed a work of a very unusual character. . . . Worthy the study of Choral Societies of every grade."—North Staffordshire Sentinel.

"There are passages of surpassing beauty and brilliance. . . . From the opening bars to the finish there was not a dull moment."—Pontypool Free Press.

"Admirably written for the voice, enhanced by charm of rhythm and picturesque accompaniments."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTH THOUSAND.

6. ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

A SACRED CANTATA
FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

(Only published in Staff Notation and Tonic Sol-fa.)

"We welcome 'Israel in the Wilderness' as one of those works which foster the love and induce the practice of music amongst the people."—Musical Standard.

"The Cantata contains all the elements of popularity, and it was excellently performed under the composer's direction, and very warmly received."—Standard.

"Effective without presenting any overwhelming difficulties. The part writing is excellent. . . . Melodious throughout."—Daily News.

"Likely to become quite as great a favourite with choral societies as 'The Holy City.'"—Daily Chronicle.

"Altogether worthy of the composer of that amazingly popular work 'The Holy City.'"—The Referee.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. NINTH THOUSAND.

7. UNA

CANTATA
FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

"Has made its way wherever heard. . . . Full of the melodious, tuneful spirit which breathes in all Mr. Gaul's work, and will add yet another leaf to the wreath which has crowned the efforts of the masterly composer of the 'Holy City' and other works."—Putney Borough News.

"Mr. Gaul's music is, as usual with him, replete with spontaneous melody."—Manchester Examiner.

"Mr. Gaul's choral writing is always fluent and pleasing, and this is fast becoming something to be thankful for."—Leeds Mercury.

"To the list of works which have proved widely acceptable, 'Una' should be added."—Athenæum.

"Choral societies have long shown that Mr. Gaul is a composer whom they are glad to accept. 'Una' will find its way amongst them easily."
—Daily Telegraph.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. SIXTY-FIFTH THOUSAND.

Revised Edition, including an INTERMEZZO or SLOW DANCE to follow the Wedding Chorus.

Performed in the Town Hall, Birmingham, on twenty occasions.

8. RUTH

A PASTORAL CANTATA
SUITABLE FOR USE IN PLACES OF WORSHIP OR FOR CONCERT PURPOSES.

TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

WITH NUMEROUS MUSICAL EXAMPLES FROM THE WORKS OF THE GREAT MASTERS.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

THE ORGAN

BY

JOHN STAINER.

EDITED BY JOHN E. WEST.

An important feature of the present Edition of this invaluable and popular Organ Primer is the adoption of the now universally recognized system of fingering—1.2.3.4.5., which is here substituted for the older system—×.1.2.3.4.—in all cases where fingering is marked.

In the explanatory portion of the book, opportunity has been taken of briefly mentioning one or two of the principal additions and improvements to the instrument which have been made since the book was first issued.

Bearing in mind that the Author's aim was to assist, in as concise a manner as possible, the early steps of an organ student, the Editor has refrained from adding any further exercises or pieces to those which were already given. But the addition of a few extra fingering and phrasing marks seemed necessary here and there, and, in the five concluding pieces, the laying-out of one or two of the manual passages has been rendered clearer to the player's eye by means of a slight re-staving.

The admirable explanations and diagrams of the Tubular-Pneumatic and Electric actions have been supplied by Mr. L. Simon, of Messrs. Norman & Beard, Ltd.

Price Two Shillings.

FIRST SONATINA in A minor. Op. 74	3	6

"Must be classed as one of the finest works in modern organ literature. The first movement is practically in usual Sonata form. The development section is particularly brilliant, and the quiet cadence leading into the recapitulation is of arresting beauty."

"The slow movement, in the nature of a chaconne, is beautiful and restful. A brilliant cadenza leads to an exciting introduction to a most interesting triple fugue (confined to manuals). Afterwards the composer works backwards through the sections preceding the fugue, unwinding himself, as it were, before starting on a magnificent Coda befitting a magnificent work."—Daily Mail.

EXAMINATION QUESTIONS
AND HOW TO WORK THEM

BY

CUTHBERT HARRIS,

Mus. Doc. Dunelm., F.R.C.O.

PREFACE.

This Primer is intended more especially for those who purpose presenting themselves for examination in the theory of music. While the subjects dealt with may be found in all examination schemes for musical degrees and diplomas, it is hoped that the following chapters may prove useful more especially to candidates for the diplomas of the Royal College of Organists.

The object of this book is to stimulate and cultivate method in answering examination questions. Considerable experience as an examination "coach" has proved the success of the method, herein followed, of dissecting the questions, and—by dividing the points for consideration under several heads—thus directing the student's attention to one point at a time.

THE MILITARY BAND

BY

GEORGE MILLER,

M.V.O., Mus. Bac. Cantab., &c.

Price Two Shillings.
In Paper Boards, Two Shillings and Sixpence.

It is a valuable sketch of a highly specialised subject, and none the less practical because seasoned with humour. The various instruments and their idiosyncrasies are tersely described, and their collective use is admirably illustrated.—Yorkshire Post.

No one is more worthy to speak on such a subject than Lieut. George Miller, and the book is one of great value.—Cheltenham Looker-On.

From this book it is possible to learn the compass and capabilities of each instrument. The explanations are admirably lucid and suggestive; and the final chapters, showing how a work composed originally for the concert-orchestra—Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony—can effectively be arranged for the military band, teaches more than all the text-books. We heartily commend this most excellent book.—Saturday Review.

COMPETITIVE FESTIVALS—AND AFTER.

BY GERALD CUMBERLAND.

Most musicians who have come into personal contact with the Competitive Festival movement are agreed that the work it has already accomplished has made, and is making, for a more general and a more complete appreciation of noble music. The movement is a democratic one. It has as its origin not the spirit of emulation alone, nor the love of music, nor the delight in comradeship, nor the legitimate pride that results from public success; but all these springs of action have conspired together and formed a magnet of attraction that has proved irresistible. What it has done has been to release a vast amount of musical energy, and to direct that energy into the most æsthetically profitable channels. The Competitive Festival movement is not a fad, nor an artificially stimulated growth, nor a sudden and hectic enthusiasm: it is a natural, steady, but swift development of hitherto unexploited and largely unsuspected forces.

But though competition is often, both in life and art, a fruitful source of stimulation, and is useful as a means to an end, it is of little value as an end in itself. Now, there can be little doubt that the various choirs regard their appearances at Festivals as the chief red-letter days in their existence ; if they win a prize, the event is the grand climacteric of all their hopes. As soon as one Festival is over, they look forward to the next, and indeed think of little else. This is not altogether harmful, but the attitude of mind that regards the winning or losing of a competition as the most important thing in the artistic life is at the best wasteful and selfish. A competition, after all, is only a test of progress made, a mere system of comparing results achieved. It is quite legitimate for the winners of a first-prize to derive satisfaction from their success ; but to regard that success as the fulfilment of endeavour, the great end and climax of study, is to lose what is best in music for the sake of a temporary excitement and a fleeting joy.

What, after all, should be the aim of musical study? Briefly, the enlargement of the mind and the ennoblement of the spirit. But the mind is not enlarged nor the spirit ennobled by conquering technical difficulties. Technique is merely a key that unlocks the treasure-house of musical thought. The chief benefit that a foreign language can confer upon us is to release to us the literature of that language with all its wealth of poetry, of knowledge, and of philosophical speculation ; the language itself has interest, of course, but it is as nothing compared with the literature of which it is the expression. With music it is precisely the same. To get into close communication with the minds of Bach, Beethoven, and Wagner one must acquire something of the technique of music ; and up to a point, the more one acquires the more intimate will that communication be. But the prime interest of all students should be in the spirit of Music and not in Music's letter. I am of course well aware that at all our important music Festivals the system of adjudication allows amply for the imaginative and æsthetic side of interpretation, and there is no manner of doubt that in the preparation of test-pieces the more finely-equipped choirs have a very just appreciation of the value of the spiritual aspect of the music they study. But this appreciation is confined almost entirely to their test-pieces. Their attention is so exclusively confined to the art of interpretation, that they are compelled in the very nature of things to restrict themselves to a very few compositions. But though a choir as a corporate body exists primarily for the purpose of excelling in interpretation, it is sheer folly to strive for technical and interpretative excellence at the cost of remaining ignorant of by far the greater part of classical and modern choral music. In a word, the striving for interpretative excellence inevitably centres the attention upon a few compositions only, and one may legitimately ask which is the better worth having : on the one hand flawless technique and a limited knowledge of music, or on the other a limited and faulty technique and a wide and comprehensive acquaintance with classical and modern compositions ?

In any case, whatever answer may be given to this question, it is certain that very many of our best choirs—particularly those in the Midlands and in the North—take but a narrow view of their artistic responsibilities, and have a quite inadequate estimate of their own worth. They themselves have been trained, largely through the instrumentality of the Competitive Movement, to an appreciation and understanding of choral music, and they have it within their power to pass on that appreciation and understanding to the general public. But do our fine choirs give concerts in their own localities? They do ; but the concerts are infrequent. Some of them, indeed, give none at all ; others give them in secret to a limited and 'invited' audience. And almost invariably the programme is devoted entirely to a number of short madrigals and part-songs, mingled with a few vocal solos and instrumental pieces. Occasionally, of course, they give the 'Messiah' and 'Elijah,' and perhaps an easy work by some third-rate contemporary writer. All this is well enough so far as it goes, but it must be remembered that precisely the same state of affairs obtained twenty years ago. In the meantime, choral technique has advanced enormously, choirs are twice as numerous as they were, public curiosity has been aroused, and composers are striking out in new directions. Yet what happens? Nothing. Our choral Societies go on preparing their test-pieces, with scarcely a look at any other music that is being written to-day. They are in the competition groove, and the conditions under which they work make it hard for them to take a wide survey of the musical field. They cannot see that we are only just at the beginning of a musical renascence in this country, and that the economic difficulties in the way of orchestral music are such as to render it a simple matter to forge ahead with choral music.

Orchestral concerts, as we know, do not pay. But whereas an orchestra is expensive, a choir costs practically nothing. The inference is obvious : choral concerts, particularly in small towns, must take the place of orchestral concerts. But a concert of short pieces is a wearisome business ; therefore we must have a cappella works of greater scope. But where are such works to be found? I must admit they are few. Modern composers, for example, are afraid to write them because our choral Societies have not sufficient initiative to give them a performance. Bantock's 'Atalanta in Calydon' is a case in point. It is a long work in four movements, written throughout for voices without a note for any orchestral instrument whatever. It has been performed once ; it will be performed again. Perhaps in the course of the next four years it will receive eight or ten performances. The nobility of the work is beyond question, and its originality and interest are acknowledged by all who have heard it and studied it ; yet here we have our scores of choral Societies all over the Kingdom content to go on from month to month and from year to year without any attempt to follow in the line of progress indicated by the work of contemporary composers. After all, the composer can do little without the help of vocalists ; his work is dead until they sing it. Other composers are ready to write works of similar form, but they are waiting for definite encouragement from our choirs. One can understand the hesitation of Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Midland choirs in giving works like 'The Apostles,' 'Omar Khayyam,' and so on, in which an expensive orchestra is an indispensable feature ; but a cappella compositions put no difficulties of this kind in the way.

I feel that it cannot too strongly be insisted upon that permanent progress can be achieved only by the diffusion and dissemination among the general public of the musical culture possessed by our best choirs. Progress should be on a broad and substantial basis. The more people who can appreciate the aims and achievements of modern choral music, the less chance will there be of our slipping back into that apathy and self-satisfaction which characterized a certain period of the Victorian era. The easiest way of bringing about this diffusion is by giving concerts of choral music only. Even small towns of a few thousand inhabitants can afford to do this, and there is no substantial reason why even the most remote districts should not join in the modern movement and take their share in bearing the responsibilities of a great and ennobling art. The Competitive Festival movement has ploughed the field, and sewn the seed ; the grain is now ripe. But we are too indifferent to gather in the harvest and to cultivate the fields that are as yet untouched

COMPETITIVE FESTIVALS AND THE NEW MUSIC.

By EDMONDSTOUNE DUNCAN.

Whatever is a real factor in the progress of music is worth discussion. To define progress, let it be boldly declared in a phrase as the New Music. Quite naturally the excellent term of three centuries ago lives again in 1912. The Monteverdean renascence exhibited it as a sign of the parting of the ways, for counterpoint and enterprise. We take it as the shibboleth of those who have drunk of the fresh founts in 'Tristan' and the 'Ring,' and are intimate with Wolf, Strauss, Debussy, Elgar, Bantock, Delius, Max Reger, and the like. In England, especially, the same trend of cultivated opinion which set back popular favourites, put Bach in his rightful place, and while demurring to an indiscriminate worship of Mozart and Beethoven, enforces a more perfect representation of such works as still claim constant regard.

Thus what appertains to the New Music is also well worth consideration. The phrase need not merely denote new and aspiring compositions; it appropriately covers every stroke of endeavour which is re-casting musical form, from song to symphony, incidentally re-galvanising many old master-works. But here is the test: If a man is no longer content to sit warming his enthusiasm at old ancestral altar-fires of Schubert and Beethoven, or the lesser divinities, Brahms and Dvorák, he is ripe for the new movement.

As those also serve who only stand and wait, so do the thought, sympathy, and goodwill of the smallest amateur count for something, once these are awakened to a proper issue. Such people not only swell our audiences, they also leaven opinion. Still more useful are those alert to identify themselves with intelligent enterprise, ready to come forward with the new, the untried, the greatly daring, and so put to practical proof ideas which, even in mere song, demand nerve, skill, and courage. The conductor is also an essential of the New Music. His the hardest yet best-recognised rôle of all.

The Competitive Festivals are emphatically not an entertainment; they are a preparatory school. We learn (as committees of choice) the difference between proper, stimulating, healthy texts and vain old ornamental things. As competitors we have begun to identify music with Nature, and less with artifice. Audiences have been learning to listen, and to do so with keen ears. The inward sense has had castigation and tutoring.

This preparatory school has also its department for adjudicators. Composers are students in the same academy. The old complaisant part-song is now frankly shelved. Those who have studied the competitive movement have been casting about to see what these choralists can do when on their mettle. Elgar has gleaned here. Its inspiring influence has set Granville Bantock writing vocal symphonies; and though the first of such efforts was produced by Hallé choralists in Manchester, everyone guesses where the idea came from, and it will be strange if these things do not return to the quarter which gave them birth.

The far-seeing good lady who founded the English competitive movement in order to encourage flickering enthusiasm in out-of-the-way places, innocently launched it from Kendal in 1885 for the mere pleasure of hearing the country folk sing. The thing was sheer novelty, having little in common with the revived Welsh Eisteddfodau, the ancient Irish 'Feis Ceoil,' or the old provincial Festivals. Miss Wakefield's schemes were sound, searching, and local. Village competitions, in which the best boy or girl, or the cleverest group of children, carried off the prize, formed the mainspring of her design. She had as coadjutor an indefatigable musician, who served as judge here and elsewhere (as the movement spread) from the very first. Miss Wakefield, though a well-trained musician of mature experience and wide outlook, could never have anticipated that these village music-makings would expand and grow until they dominated the whole rural music of the North of England. Art-enterprise in the long run knows no personal sway. Its track is zig-zag and brilliant. You might as well expect lightning to travel no otherwise than by the village church-steeple rod as a new and welcome idea to chafe in set trammels. So this little movement spread from the hill-girt town of Kendal, with its population of under 14,000 souls, to the smoke-begrimed cities, and beyond to the pleasant watering-places, where big industrial crowds foregather for brief snatches of sun, breeze, and play. It is even now unchecked: witness the remarkable inaugurations at Glasgow (1911) and Birmingham (1912). Even London has risen to the occasion.

Looking back, it was perfectly natural that the fire-wave of progress, purging all active musical centres of mediocrity, should reach the competition platform. But no one guessed it would blaze up so suddenly. This perhaps it most obviously did at Morecambe and afterwards at Blackpool, where in ten brilliant years remarkable results have accrued. Here audiences delight in Bach, Byrde, Berlioz, Brahms, Cornelius, Delius, Palestrina, Elgar, and Bantock, to name a few favourites, tolerating a minimum of the Victorian part-song composers. Here, more than anywhere, one realises what is meant by ear-marking a song. Take a Brahms lyric, an example of the New Music, or anything fine; a visitor hears it some twenty or thirty times, always patiently straining towards the revelation, which generally arrives. Then he re-hears the same song given by a picked group of three or four of the best competitors. Finally comes a carefully-weighed judgment and criticism of the chief performances. That song is ear-marked. It is not spoiled, and becomes a tangible possession—as of a friendship fully realised—for life, an enduring thing of beauty. Woe to him who ventures it foolishly in such cultivated ears at any future time!

Choral singing passes through the same cleansing fires. Who that has heard the nervous, highly-wrought, expressive tone-capacity of Herbert Whittaker's, or Mrs. Bourne's, and half-a-dozen other superb choirs can put up with the artificial sentimentality once the vogue? It is this high standard, constantly challenged and refreshed from all directions, that has rejuvenated choral music throughout England. Its effect is far-reaching and even sometimes rather disquieting, for our great city concert choirs 1,000 strong have no such achievement to exhibit. Where else do we find the delicacy, the exaltation, the inspiration? Have we parted company with these at the end of Lytham pier? Do such qualities only haunt the precincts of Blackpool Opera House, or the Morecambe Winter Gardens? The secret lies in the birth of an idea. To the earlier Festivals came various parties of choral people, some with shrewd notions of effect, others with little or none. Experiment came too, and in its train quite a new sort of music, having its roots in emotion, with a power that begat (both in performers and conductors) intense eagerness and longing for its survival. Then the new choral conductor sprang up, to whom mere effect was an empty phrase, while interpretation meant absorption and re-fabrication of the imaginative idea.

These things attracted the attention of Elgar, Bantock, and others, who were impelled to write for such resources music that hardly anyone else could do so well. And now, if one wants to hear the best of such creations, he must go to the Competitive Festivals. The works are theirs, and purified by keen criticism and fearless judgment. They have learned to deliver the message of the music, and the effect on the auditors as far as appreciation goes is to transform them into so many practised critics.

Doubtless a first visit would scarcely make all this plain. A stranger might even resent the long train of singers going through the same music over and over again, and become sick of the whole business. But if he stays, and exercises and develops his own powers of comparison and criticism, the monotony disappears; he enters into the ruling passion, and joins in the search for a singer with a voice, or one that has an idea, and the choir that has interpretative ability. He soon discovers that the two things need not go together. There is a voice of pure gold, with all the commonplace expression of a cornet; there is also the whispering pipe which thrills and delights you right through, because in its very weakness it catches at the roots of poetry and hints strange music which goes deep down to the soul. The judge hears it too, and if he does not make a fool of himself (as you or I might), and award full marks, method comes to his aid and eliminates blind trust in emotion or the casual pleasure of the ear. For as the competitor sang, he was on the look-out for the fulfilment of a simple formula. The singing drew marks for being in tune; its careful training was duly noted. The singer's vowels were clear; consonants were not clicked;—how runs the adjudicatory jargon?—the breath was well managed; and the whole interpretation proved sound and effective. So from many others, four competitors perhaps are now picked to sing again. This is the hardest trial, with the best singers in close proximity.

After quite a small experience, one never asks again what good does it all do?

It is evident that some strange necromancy attends these simple doings. At Festival time the little town of Kendal for the best part of a week becomes the most musical spot in all England. The London critics descend upon it. Its fame is everywhere. Crowds of youngsters have been preparing for it for over a twelvemonth, tireless in their honest, healthy emulation of each other. The test-music, perhaps from Wolf, Wagner, Bantock, or Elgar, or others responsible for the New Music, makes it imperative that self-cultivation should be in rigorous earnest. They now come before you with as much courage as an apprentice before the Sängerkrieg. They know you may hear better voices; their trust is in keener preparation, or in superior nerve. Fear of remarks from a witty judge does not deter your true competitor if the wit is not idle verbiage. In due course, behold him a centre of new activity! He has learned patience, self-possession, self-criticism. He has come face to face with the prophets of music; you can no longer bamboozle him with commonplaces.

Choirs have also gained new life, new aims, a better reputation, and a purified self-esteem. The best know that wherever they go the trust reposed in them is much more than in those choirs with no competitive training.

It is amusing to watch a Blackpool or Morecambe crowd picking out a winner. Every ear for a time seems strained in the attempt to anticipate a verdict. Quite commonly applause proves that this has been truly done. The general opinion always treads close on the heels of the professional—it might be whispered that it has been known to better it. The development of this capacity in large crowds, such as the towns mentioned so commonly muster, is invaluable. When it re-appears, properly led, in our concert-rooms, commonplace Kapellmeistermusik and things prosaic and effete will have short shrift.

Musically speaking, what Blackpool does to-day the North of England will do to-morrow; and the music chosen for performance during the October week will immediately make its way into hundreds of places. In this way Bach and Byrd and the greatest of old writers find their road back to the concert-room, and become illustrious and even popular throughout the land. Still more to the point is it that the New Music of dauntless aim, extraordinary variety, and splendid outlook finds here a home. Its advent was alone worth all the travail of the competitive movement.

The weak point in the armour of the Competitive Festivals is their orchestral music. A busy centre like Blackpool with difficulty inveigles two or three amateur orchestras to her annual fête; yet she spends hundreds of pounds in the attempt. Not a few of the Festivals ignore this matter entirely. Kendal bridges the difficulty by simply engaging Sir Henry Wood's Queen's Hall orchestra en bloc to provide her instrumental music. But such a solution, however interesting, is somewhat outside the competitive idea. Yet is there always hope when one remembers that far Aberdeen can year after year muster orchestral competitors.

If the special adaptability of Competitive Festivals for the propagation of the principles of the New Music be admitted, their importance cannot be overstated.

The fact that they produce the new stuff at all ensures that it shall crop up side by side with the best and most enduring material of all times. Assuming that the master-works hold their own (for a time at least), all else suffers irretrievably by the mere juxtaposition with fresh, lively creations of our best contemporary writers. For interpretation in the new emotional school, demanding mood, imagination, and something as utterly unknown to the old choral art as electricity to the scientific friends of Queen Anne, perforce rings in the new and rings out the old.

THE AYRSHIRE MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

We regret that by an oversight the results in the Church Choir section were wrongly stated. The first place was gained by the Winton Place G. U. Congregational Church Choir, Kilmarnock, under Mr. Walter Brooke, Dr. McNaught said he admired greatly the conductor; under his baton the choir was like an organ. It was a beautiful performance of the test ('God so loved the world,' Stainer). The High Parish Choir was second with only one mark behind.

NEWMARKET.—August 5.

The 'Chair' Eisteddfod was a great success. The second choral male-voice prize was won by the 'Brythoniad' (St. Helen's) Choir (Mr. Abram Jones). The chief male-voice class drew five choirs. The Ffynnongroew Male-Voice Choir (Mr. T. E. Jones) won first place. Dr. Caradog Roberts adjudicated.

At the semi-national Eisteddfod held at Llandyssul, Cardiganshire, on August 7, the Carmarthen Ladies' Choir won the first-prize in their class. In the absence of Miss Buckley, the conductor, Miss May Matthews directed the Choir.

Active preparations are being made for the Morecambe Festival, which is to be held from April 29 to May 3. Dr. Walford Davies, Dr. McNaught, and Mr. Harry Evans will adjudicate. Mr. Evans will also conduct the Festival Choir. The new secretary is Mr. W. C. Fawcett (address, Festival Offices).

is not one who undergoes a daily grind at the keyboard to "keep in practice," but one who, freed from all the usual drudgery, can devote himself entirely to the spirit of the music, unhampered by any technical difficulties.

This revolution in the Art is effected by the introduction of the well-known MACDONALD SMITH SYSTEM. Little can be explained in an advertisement, but full details of the Postal Course are given in the Illustrated Book, "Light on Pianoforte Playing," sent free by post.

Complete Course of Lessons by Correspondence,

Three Guineas (by Instalments if desired).

Course "B" for Beginners, Course "C" for Players.

"PIANOFORTE PLAYING," and other Articles

by Macdonald Smith, 32 pp., post-free, 7d.

Terms and Conditions for Personal Lessons (to Concert Players only) on application.

FURTHER TESTIMONY TO THE REMARKABLE RESULTS OBTAINED FROM THE EHREMAYER SYSTEM OF PIANOFORTE SIGHT-PLAYING

Dunfermline, June 25, 1912.

Dear Sir,

The Course has been of the utmost benefit to me, my organist work being greatly benefited thereby, and I have no hesitation in saying that it has been the best Course that ever I had in that the result has been so quickly achieved.

Thanking you for your pleasing and thorough Course as well as for your encouraging guidance, (Signed) A. B. S.

Demerara, British Guiana, May 11, 1912.

Dear Sir,

By the aid of your Course, all my troubles in sight-playing have disappeared. My eyes systematically group the notes spontaneously; I am no longer troubled by the difficulty of finding chords and differentiating accidentals; pieces which at first gave trouble to read even after several practices are read now with pleasure. My general reading was more or less laboured; now it is free, spontaneous, and pleasurable. I would recommend the System to every musician under the sun, for without it only a born genius could ever acquire the ability to play at first sight in so short a time. (Signed) H. A. T.

CAPE TOWN FESTIVAL, 1912.

Elijah.—"Nothing that Mr. Charles Knowles has done during the Festival equals his singing of Elijah's music last night. It was broadly designed and sincerely felt, and full of dignity."—Cape Times.

Elijah.—"The principal parts were magnificently sustained. Mr. Charles Knowles, the Elijah, was beyond all praise. His numbers stood out even in the brilliant performance of which they were part."—Cape Argus.

PORT ELIZABETH FESTIVAL, 1912.

Elijah.—"Mr. Charles Knowles was heard here in the music of the 'Prophet' for the first time, and from first to last amply demonstrated to his audience how wonderfully well equipped he is vocally and intellectually to essay this, the finest music of the oratorio. Mr. Knowles has a magnificent bass-baritone voice of great range and fervour. Its quality is beautifully rich and mellow, and he produces it with consummate ease. In the duet with Miss Breare, 'What have I to do with thee,' he sang with fine passion and dramatic power. In the scene with the prophets of Baal he was very fine, his 'Call him louder' being very effective. His rendering of 'Lord God of Abraham,' was most reverent and devotional, while in the magnificent and difficult air, 'Is not His word like a fire?' he sang superbly and with a thorough mastery of the music. In 'It is enough' he was also most impressive, and the same solemnity characterized his rendering of 'For the mountains shall depart.' It was a great pleasure for us to hear Mr. Knowles in 'Elijah.' He has the ideal voice for Mendelssohn's music, it being free from that wretched vibrato that afflicts some of our most prominent singers. He gets the tremolo effect when the music and the words require it, but vibrato as such has no place in his voice."—Eastern Province Herald.

KIMBERLEY FESTIVAL, 1912.

Elijah.—"Mr. Charles Knowles is the possessor of a very fine baritone voice, and his power and dramatic feeling were well shown in the grand aria, 'Is not His word like a fire?' His rendering was magnificent, and called forth loud applause. 'Lord God of Abraham' gave one the opportunity of hearing him in sustained melody, and in 'It is enough' he did ample justice to the quality of pathos expressed in both words and setting.

"Kimberley should indeed be proud of having heard the leading English exponent of the part of Elijah. It was an experience which will not soon be forgotten."—Kimberley Star.

DURBAN FESTIVAL, 1912.

Hiawatha.—"It is hardly necessary to record that both received a very warm reception from the audience, the popularity of both singers being already established through previous visits. Mr. Charles Knowles sang his comparatively few lines most effectively. In his first short solo, 'Gitche Manito, the Mighty,' he not only charmed his listeners with the melodious resonance of his fine organ, but in the interpretation of the words, 'Give me food for my dying Minnehaha,' there was the requisite dramatic touch of the actor, as well as the vocal artist, and his rendering of the descriptive lines was most thrilling in its effect. In 'Farewell,' his final number, the audience were treated to a most delightful performance, perfect in tonal quality, finish, and expression, but all too short."—Natal Mercury

JOHANNESBURG.

"Mr. Charles Knowles was in splendid form, and sang with all that vim and earnestness which is characteristic of all he does. His renderings are noticeable examples of the well-governed emotional order, well constructed on a sound and solid foundation. Needless to say, he made his usual success with his very first number, which happened to be the 'Pagliacci' Prologue, and which was an excellent specimen of the kind referred to as treated by him, containing just that amount of subdued feeling and restricted passion which is demanded by its own position and the character of the work it prefaces. Happy as ever, too, was he in his soldier songs, a beautiful new song—that is, new in the matter of presentation to the public—from the pen of the late Airley Dix, entitled 'Soldier, what of the night?' making a deep impression, while his rendering of 'The Old Shako,' given as an encore number, completed his triumph."—Johannesburg Star.

CAPE TOWN MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

Golden Legend.—"As stated, the singing of these talented artists was very fine indeed. Mr. Charles Knowles was in splendid voice, and his rendering of Lucifer's commands and threatenings was full of dramatic force and verve."—Cape Argus.

SAMUEL COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.

The Musical Times
AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.
OCTOBER 1, 1912.

SAMUEL COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.

BORN AUGUST 15, 1875.
DIED SEPTEMBER 1, 1912.

The mournful news of the untimely death of Samuel Coleridge-Taylor on September 1, was a painful shock to all who knew him or knew of him. His illness was brief: a few days suffering from pneumonia, and the end came.

In our issue for March, 1909, we gave a full sketch of the late composer's career. It is therefore not necessary now to do more than recapitulate the leading incidents there recounted, and to bring the record up to date. We renew, for the sake of recent subscribers, the separate portrait given in 1909.

Samuel Coleridge-Taylor was born at 15, Theobald's Road, Holborn, London, on August 15, 1875. His father, Dr. Hugh Taylor, a medical man, was a native of Sierra Leone, and he studied in London for his profession. He died some years ago in his native land. His mother was an Englishwoman. Neither of his parents was distinctively musical. When he was about a year old his mother removed to Croydon, Surrey, and from that time until his death Mr. Taylor resided in this neighbourhood. He very early in life displayed musical ability, which was observed by the master of the day school he attended. This led to the youth joining the choir of St. George's Presbyterian Church, Croydon. Later, at the request of Colonel Herbert Walters, V.D., an amateur who resided in the town, he joined the choir of the parish church of St. Mary, Addiscombe, near Croydon. Taylor's musical faculty now rapidly developed, and Colonel Walters, who had acted as a fairy-godfather to the composer throughout his career, secured his entry to the Royal College of Music in 1890. At first he took the violin as principal study, but later, acting under the advice of Dr. (now Sir Charles) Stanford, he abandoned the violin and adopted composition. In 1893 he gained a three years' scholarship, which at the end of the period was renewed for one more year. He composed a good deal, chiefly for instruments, and was fortunate in securing performances that brought him into public attention. Joachim was so pleased with a Clarinet quintet (Op. 10) composed by Taylor, that he led a performance of it at Berlin in 1897.

He left the College in 1897, and as he did not pursue tuition elsewhere he must be regarded as a pure home product. His greatest achievement, as all the world knows, was his strikingly original setting of 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast.' This was performed for the first time at a Royal College concert on November 11, 1898. Fame was the immediate result, and he was encouraged to set the other parts the of poem — 'The death of Minnehaha' and 'Hiawatha's departure,' completing the trilogy. Many commissions followed, and his position as a leading composer was firmly established. On December 30, 1899, he married Jessie F. Walmisley, a daughter of Colonel Walmisley, who was a cousin of Thomas Attwood Walmisley, the glee writer. Amongst his numerous activities he frequently adjudicated at musical competitions. His judgments on these critical occasions were highly valued, not only because they were suggestive and amiable, but because they showed true insight. A year or two ago, at the invitation of the new principal, Mr. Landon Ronald, he joined the staff of the Guildhall School of Music.

The funeral took place on September 5. A service was held at the Church of St. Michael, West Croydon, and the interment took place at Bandon Hill Cemetery. Amongst the large congregation there were many well-known musicians. Floral tributes were sent by the Royal Choral Society, the Royal Academy of Music, the Guildhall School of Music, Trinity College of Music, the London Symphony and New Symphony Orchestras, the Stock Exchange Musical Society, the Alexandra Palace Choral Society, the String Players' Club, the Bournemouth Orchestra, Messrs. Novello & Co., besides numerous others from musicians and personal friends.

Coleridge-Taylor's music has definite characteristics. He was fond of strong, clear-cut rhythms, which are often much repeated. Warmth of melody and abundant colour are nearly always features. His own outlook on the poetry he set was always intimately reflected in his music, which seems to bubble up with self-expression. Although the fluency of his writing suggests spontaneity, we have his word that he had almost a mania for revising. At the first inspiration he wrote his music very rapidly, and then, as he has told us, he would re-write and revise perhaps twenty times. One of his latest, and what bids fair to be one of his most popular works—the cantata, 'A tale of Old Japan,' brimful, as it seems, of flowing spontaneity—was in many places written several times before it satisfied him. Yet it could hardly be said that he had a supreme gift of self-criticism. In his early 'Hiawatha' days he enjoyed the wise counsel of the late Mr. A. J. Jaeger, and as he (Coleridge-Taylor) often remarked, this was an invaluable formative influence. Although he passed through a course of counterpoint at the College, he never sought self-expression through contrapuntal idioms. He leaned rather to solid chords and attractively picturesque changes of key, and vivid dynamic contrasts; and he had a fine sense of the effect of climax. As a rule his choral music is not difficult to perform, because it is so singable. Just as a good composer writes for a violin in view of the possibilities of its technique and does not treat it as a pianoforte, so Taylor instinctively wrote vocal music for voices.

A TRIBUTE FROM SIR HUBERT PARRY.

Sir Hubert Parry, the Principal of the Royal College of Music, writes to us as follows:

The regret and even astonishment at the sudden cutting short of a life brimming with artistic activity will be so widely diffused that it would be waste of words to dwell upon it. There will be thousands who will feel a sense of saddening loss when, in surroundings in which it had become familiar, they miss the arresting face in which gentleness, humour, and modesty were so strangely combined with authoritative decision when matters of art were in question.

It is to the general credit that people accepted command and criticism from one whose appearance was so strikingly unoccidental. The racial combination could not leave people quite indifferent any more than it could be indifferent in the artistic product. But when Coleridge-Taylor came to the Royal College of Music he was accepted on terms of full equality, and soon won the affection of every one with whom he came into contact. He began with composition and violin as his principal subjects and was unusually proficient in harmony, and ultimately became equally proficient in counterpoint. Violin at length dropped out, and was replaced by pianoforte and organ; but the pianoforte did not progress very far, probably owing to the singular structure of his hands; which looked as if it would have been impossible for him to attain much technique on a keyed instrument. But as a matter of fact he did play, and naturally played with artistic sense and feeling. His compositions before long poured out in a spontaneous flood, showing the influence of the composers who appealed to him most at different periods. He passed through various phases, and for a short while was influenced by Brahms; but this influence more or less evaporated, and he came more under the influence of Dvorák, between whom and himself there was some racial analogy; but it is notable that what appealed to him was always of a high order; and he was inclined to attack the highest and most concentrated forms of art. Among over twenty compositions of his which were performed at College concerts were a String quartet in D minor, Fantasie-Stücke for string quartet, a Clarinet quintet, a Nonet for pianoforte, wind, and strings, and three movements of a Symphony in A minor. This stood him in good stead when he came before the world in his own special line; for he was so permeated by the diction of the finest masters of his art, that an elevated style and distinction of artistic quality had become part of his outfit.

The first performance of the first part of 'Hiawatha' in 1898, in the makeshift concert-room of the College, which was known as the 'tin tabernacle,' was one of the most remarkable events in modern English musical history. It had got abroad in some unaccountable and mysterious manner that something of unusual interest was going to happen, and when the time came for the concert the 'tin tabernacle' was besieged by eager crowds, a large proportion of whom were shut out—but accommodation was found for Sir Arthur Sullivan and other musicians of eminence. Expectation was not disappointed, and 'Hiawatha' started on a career which, when confirmed by the production of 'The death of Minnehaha' at the North Staffordshire Festival in the following year, 1899, and of a final section by the Royal Choral Society in 1900, established it as one of the most universally beloved works of modern English music.

By the time it came into existence the narration type of musical cantata was getting discredited. But Coleridge-Taylor was peculiarly fitted by racial combination to produce an exception to the conventional tendency. The primitive nature delighted in stories. He himself said that he was mainly attracted to Longfellow's poem by the funny names in it. At any rate it was simple, unanalytic, straightforward pleasure in the simple story which appealed to him. He did not thirst for intellectual analysis, for recondite problems, or for odd and self-conscious effects. He wanted to put down what welled up in him quite simply and straightforwardly. Like his half-brothers of primitive race he loved plenty of sound, plenty of colour, simple and definite rhythms, and above all things plenty of tune. Tune pours out in passage after passage, genial and kindly and apt to the subject, and, in an emotional way, often warmly and touchingly expressive. The pure occidental composer would have gone wrong trying to do something subtle and uncanny to show the fineness of his insight—and details would have got out of gear. But Coleridge-Taylor had no such temptations. The musical activity was so prompt in him that he had no occasion for researchfulness. The balance of style is perfectly maintained. It is in this that the inwardness of a very interesting situation may be recognised. It was the very simplicity and unconsciousness of his character which caused the racial motives and impulses to be revealed so clearly. He had no occasion to conceal them; and the niche which he made for himself in musical history derives its individuality from the frankness with which he revealed the qualities which were the inevitable outcome of an exceptional and interesting combination of influences.

A list of Coleridge-Taylor's works was given in the Musical Times for March, 1909. The following is a list of later works:

Op. 73.	Ballad in C minor ...	Violin and pianoforte.
Op. 73a. (?)	All are sleeping, weary heart... ...	Male-voice part-songs.
	Loud sang the Spanish cavalier ...
	O mariners, out of the sunlight ...
	O who will worship the great god Pan
Op. 74.	Scenes from an imaginary ballet ...	Pianoforte.
Op. 75.	The 'Bamboula' rhapsodic dance ... (Norfolk Musical Festival, Conn., U.S.A., 1910.)	Orchestra.
Op. 76.	A tale of Old Japan	Cantata.
Op. 77.	Petite Suite de Concert	Orchestra.
Op. 78.	Three Impromptus	Organ.
Op. 79.	Incidental music to the play, 'Othello.'
Op. 80.	Concerto in G minor for violin and orchestra. (Norfolk Musical Festival, Conn., U.S.A., 1911.)
Op. 81.	'Waiting' / 'Red o' the dawn'	(MS.) Songs with orchestral accompaniment.
Op. 82.	'Hiawatha' Ballet in 5 scenes (MS.)...	Orchestra.

WITHOUT OPUS NUMBERS.

Incidental music to the play 'Forest of Wild Thyme' (partly in MS. ; the Intermezzo and three Dream Dances are published), orchestra or pianoforte.

A lament.	Willow song.
Life and death (MS.).
The links o' love.

GWENDOLEN AND HIAWATHA COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.
(From a Photograph by the Churchill Studio.)

We are informed that on the initiation of Colonel Walters a scheme is under discussion to give a great concert at the Royal Albert Hall early in November, in memory of the departed composer. Nothing has been definitely settled, but an influential committee is being formed, and whether the concert is or is not given, the memorial will take some practical shape.

The numerous friends and admirers of the late composer will, it is confidently hoped, unite to give their generous support to the scheme decided upon by the committee.

We are asked by the conductor of the Central Croydon Choral Society to announce that the Society will give a memorial concert on November 23. As the late Mr. Coleridge-Taylor resided near Croydon, this is a very natural expression of sympathy and tribute of regret.

MR. CECIL SHARP.

The cult of folk-music in England is one of the remarkable enthusiasms of modern times. Up till the end of the last century there were some laudable efforts to collect* folk-song, but more with a belief in its antiquarian interest than with an idea that discoveries would be of general utility or of any particular artistic importance. Chappell, whose name is so familiar as the author of 'Popular Music of the Olden Time' did not take down tunes; he simply searched for early printed versions, and no doubt did much to rescue many excellent tunes from oblivion. So little real collecting had taken place until the present century that it was declared by some writers that there was practically no strictly English folk-music, or that if it had ever existed it was irretrievably lost. But happily there were some optimists who would not accept this conclusion, and who set to work to dig and delve in village and countryside. Their efforts were soon rewarded with success. In this quest no one has been more distinguished than Mr. Cecil Sharp, the subject of this article. For several years past he has given his whole time to the task, and his success is widely recognised—in one instance in a practical if inadequate shape by the granting by H. M. Government of a pension of £100 a year.

Mr. Cecil Sharp was born at Denmark Hill, Camberwell, London, on November 22 (St. Cecilia's Day—a happy omen!), 1859. His parents were both very musical. Cecil was one of a family of eleven children. His mother still survives. In early childhood he was very fond of music, and his bent in this direction took the form of playing the pianoforte. He enjoyed no special instruction; just absorbing the nursery type of teaching which is so often futile, and sometimes so pathetic in its immeasurable, dogged patience. Before he was eight years of age, Cecil was sent to a preparatory boarding-school at Brighton, and when he was ten he entered the lower school at Uppingham. This new world was no doubt the real turning-point in his musical life, for at this famous school he came under the beneficent influence of Paul David, the revered music-master of the School, who is, happily, still living in the flesh—and doubtless he will always live in the memory of generations of Uppingham boys to whose musical needs he so ably and genially ministered. Whilst at Uppingham, Sharp continued to study pianoforte playing. He did not try any other instrument. He joined the singing class, and as he had a low voice, he was found useful for trios. Amongst the pleasantest of his recollections of his school life he counts the privilege of hearing Mr. David and members of the music staff play quartets. The music at Uppingham during this period was much in advance of the times, so far as the great public schools are concerned in the comparison, and it was a formative force in the general education of the boys, either as performers or listeners. 'The Messiah,' 'Elijah,' and other well-known oratorios and cantatas were periodically performed. Cecil Sharp left Uppingham in 1876, and after three years of private tuition he entered Clare College, Cambridge. This was during the period when Stanford was organist at Trinity College and a leading musical light at the University. During his course at Cambridge, Mr. Sharp passed the first examination for the Bachelor of Music degree. He left in 1882, after taking a B.A. in the Mathematical Tripos. In the same year he decided to go to Australia, because this expanding Colony seemed to offer fair scope for a budding musician. Soon after his arrival he became choirmaster and organist (an office he was not specially prepared to fill) at the Cathedral at Adelaide, South Australia. While carrying out the duties of this post he accepted the appointment of Associate to the Right Hon. Sir Samuel Way, Bart., who was then, as he is now, the Chief Justice. This offered an opening to the South Australian Bar, but after due consideration Sharp decided that bars of another kind had more attraction for him. So in 1887 he relinquished the legal appointment and formally adopted the musical profession. His first step was to enter into a partnership with Herr Reimann, who was one of the leading musicians of the city, and to join him in the direction of the Adelaide College of Music. This institution made great progress, and ultimately formed the nucleus of the Conservatoire of Music established by the University of Adelaide. Sharp also conducted the city Philharmonic Society (choral and orchestral). He states that the orchestra—upon the efficiency of which so much depended—was composed of professional and amateur performers, and was quite a respectable one. In 1890 he wrote a light opera, 'Sylvia,' a setting of a libretto by Guy Boothby, which was produced at the Theatre Royal. Early in 1892 he gave up the work in Adelaide with a view of seeking his fortune in England. He settled in London, and pursued professional avocations, teaching and lecturing. In 1893 he became conductor of the Finsbury Choral Association (formerly conducted by the recently deceased Mr. Dale). This office he held for four years. In 1896 he became principal of the Hampstead Conservatoire of Music, and remained in that position until 1905, when he resolved to devote himself to folk music. His thoughts and ambition were first turned in this direction by witnessing a performance of Morris Dances at Headington (Oxford). It was also partly the result of the experience (1893 to 1910) derived as music-master at Ludgrove, a preparatory school for Eton, where he realised the value of folk-songs as a foundation for a musical education. In 1902 he published a 'Book of British Song,' a compilation of national and folk-songs taken from printed sources. After the publication of this book he began to think more seriously of collecting folk-songs himself. He first visited rural districts in Somerset, being specially attracted to that county by the Rev. Charles Marson, Vicar of Hambridge, who had an intimate acquaintance with the neighbourhood and its people. In 1904 the first volume of 'Folk-songs from Somerset' was issued under the joint editorship of Mr. Sharp and Mr. Marson. The next two volumes were also written in collaboration, but vols. iv. and v. were edited by Mr. Sharp alone. In November, 1903, at the Hampstead Conservatoire, he gave his first lecture on the subject of Folk-song. At this period Mr. Sharp was deeply impressed with the artistic and educational value of the songs, and the probability of their appealing to the popular taste. In placing himself in the front line with other folk-song enthusiasts Mr. Sharp did not claim to have originated the folk-song movement. He fully recognises the admirable pioneer work of the Rev. S. Baring-Gould, Miss Lucy Broadwood, Mr. Frank Kidson, and others. He joined the committee of the Folk-song Society in 1904, and in 1906 the first book of Morris dances, which he edited with Mr. Herbert MacIlwaine, was published. The great success of this book soon led to further original investigation, and the publication of more volumes of Morris-, Country-, and Sword-Dances. Another notable contribution to folk-song literature was the publication in 1907 of 'English Folk-song: some Conclusions.' Here the whole folk-song position is argued, and its claim to recognition by British composers as the foundation of a national school of music asserted. The book is a kind of manifesto of Mr. Sharp's line of thought. Some of the more remarkable contentions made have recently been the subject of a piquant controversy, to which allusion will be made later on.

* A term that has derived the meaning of noting down the music and words of songs directly from countryside folk-singers, as distinguished from the commoner meaning of collecting existing printed music.

Mr. Sharp was now so devoted to the cult that he gave up all other work in music and spent his whole time in collecting, editing, and disseminating the songs and dances. One of his most effective methods of popularising the subject has been through lectures, of which he has recently given about seventy annually.

But it was obvious that dissemination of the dances on a large scale was only possible through the training of teachers. It is comparatively easy for a competent musician to take down a folk-song, and easier still to teach it; but the case is altogether different with the dances. Here was a new technique, which had first to be acquired and then passed on to others. So far as this generation is concerned a new art had to be learned. These considerations brought Mr. Sharp into association with Miss Wilke, the head of the Chelsea Physical Training College, an institution which is recognised by the Board of Education, and inspected by their officers. This co-operation provided the folk-dance movement with a central home, and gave it a fresh impetus. The dances now form part of the regular curriculum of the College, and the scheme provides for a systematic training of teachers. As the work expanded and the demand for teachers became increasingly insistent, it was realised that an even wider organization was necessary. So in December, 1911, the English Folk-dance Society was formed, the stated object of which is:

'To disseminate a knowledge of English folk-dances, singing games, and folk-songs, and to encourage the practice of them in their traditional forms.' The Society is governed by a committee, and has its offices at 11, Hart Street, Bloomsbury. Full particulars as to membership can be obtained from the secretary, Miss Walsh, at the foregoing address. The Society hopes to attain its object by the formation of branches in the chief provincial centres. Already such branches have been formed at Manchester, Liverpool, Oxford, Cirencester, &c. One of the chief activities of the Society is the organization of the Vacation School of Folk-song and Dance at Stratford-on-Avon (the operations of which were described in our last number), at the invitation of the Governors of the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre. Mr. Sharp is the Director of the Society and of the school at Stratford.

Mr. Sharp has closely systematised his method of tabulating his collection. Every tune he notes is given a number, and is afterwards indexed and collated with other versions, if any. At present nearly three thousand melodies have been so recorded. The work of collecting songs and dances is still proceeding, for there is much more to be done in this direction, and much of the traditional music will be lost for ever if it is not speedily fixed in musical notation.

The following extracts from 'English Folk-song: some Conclusions,' will explain in Mr. Sharp's own words the position he takes. In the Introduction he explains that:

The main thesis of this book is the evolutionary origin of the folk-song. Now, this is not a question of merely an academic interest, but one upon which many practical considerations depend. The claims, for example, made by those who advocate the re-introduction of folk-songs into our national life, all hinge upon this question of origin. They rest upon the assumption that folk-music is generically distinct from ordinary music; that the former is not the composition of the individual and, as such, limited in outlook and appeal but a communal and racial product, the expression, in musical idiom, of aims and ideals that are primarily national in character. Once establish the fact that the folk-song has not been made by the one but evolved by the many, and its national character and its fitness to serve a national purpose follow as a natural consequence. Musicians would then no longer place 'Tom Bowling' and 'The seeds of love' in the same category, but perceive that they typify, respectively, two distinct species of music, that differ not in degree but in kind. The educationist, too, would be alert to the danger of confounding folk-song with art-song, and realise that, although both may serve his purpose, he must, nevertheless, be careful to assign to each a separate niche in the ideal educational scheme.

As to the formative and selective action of the community he says:

The individual, then, invents; the community selects. It is necessary to dwell upon this point, because it is one which is often misapprehended by the opponents of the communal theory. Only the other day, for instance, in reviewing a book of traditional ballads, the critic quoted a couplet from 'Sir Patrick Spens,' scoffed at the possibility of its communal origin, and exclaimed that such lines as those could only have sprung from the brain of an individual. Of course they did. Every line, every word, of the ballad sprang in the first instance from the head of some individual, reciter, minstrel, or peasant; just as every note, every phrase, of a folk-tune proceeded originally from the mouth of a solitary singer. Corporate action has originated nothing and can originate nothing. Communal composition is unthinkable. The community play a part, it is true, but it is at a later stage, after and not before the individual has done his work and manufactured the material. Its part is then to weigh, sift, and select from the mass of individual suggestions those which most accurately express the popular taste and the popular ideal; to reject the rest; and then, when more variations are produced, to repeat the process once more, and again once more. The process goes on unceasingly while the ballad lives; or until it gets into print when, of course, its progress is checked, so far as educated singers are concerned.

After discussing some matters of musical history he remarks that:

The fact is, of course, that there exists at the present day no national school of English music. Since the death of Purcell, as we have seen, the educated classes have patronized the music of the foreigner, to the exclusion of that of the Englishman. Foreign vocalists, singing in a foreign tongue, have for two centuries monopolized the operatic stage; while English concert platforms have, during the same period, been exclusively occupied by alien singers and instrumentalists, singing and playing the compositions of European writers.

He then points out that there are English musicians living who far outshine any of their predecessors of the previous century, but their warmest admirers will admit that they have written nothing that can be called distinctively English music. On this he remarks:

This is the fact. Is this deplorable state of things to continue indefinitely? Is there no remedy? Is England, the land of Shakespeare, to go down to posterity as the only nation in all Europe incapable of original musical expression? Or, is there any justification for the more comforting prediction that the recent recoveries of English folk-song—of music that is which is distinctively national and English, and therefore inherently different from that of every other nation in the world—will eventually lead to the foundation of an English National School of Composition comparable with any one of the great Continental Schools of Music?

After briefly tracing the decadence of English music, he says:

The question of vital importance for us now to consider is whether English music is capable of resuscitation. One thing is certain: the present vogue of training English musicians to lisp in the tongue of the foreigner can have no beneficial outcome. It is, emphatically, not that way that salvation lies. Nor, on the other hand, need we listen to the pessimists. They, like the poor, are always with us, and will never weary of reminding us that we are an unmusical race, that we have no temperament, and so forth. We may safely turn a deaf ear to such croakings, and console ourselves with two considerations.

As we were capable of holding our own at one time, he argues that we may do so again, as the folk-songs prove that we possess a natural and inherent musical faculty of no mean order:

So long as we believed that we were barren of folk-song, it must be confessed that the musical prospects of the nation looked black. It seemed extremely difficult to credit ourselves with any musical ability, comparable with that of other European nations, if, unlike theirs, our peasantry were unable to express themselves in terms of dance and song. Seeing, too, that every school of music on the Continent had been founded upon folk-song, how were we English to follow their example if we had not the material with which to build? How were we to make bricks without straw?

It will be gathered from the foregoing extracts that Mr. Sharp has impregnable belief in the artistic merits and popular utility of folk music, and that he visions great potentialities for it as affording a proper basis for the founding of a characteristic national style of composition.

These doctrines, and the theory he holds as to the refining and beautifying effect of communal influence in the evolution of folk-music, have been stoutly challenged; notably in an article entitled 'The Folk-song Fallacy,' contributed by Mr. Ernest Newman to the English Review (May, 1912). This article naturally drew forth a defence from Mr. Sharp (July), and this in its turn brought a rejoinder (August) from Mr. Newman. Probably all that can be said for or against the folk-song cult will be found in these interesting articles tersely and epigrammatically expressed.

Mr. Newman asks what is the 'national musical idiom' about which so much is said, and further he asks:

Who could ever hope, for instance, to find one common formula for the idioms of Debussy, d'Indy, Berlioz, Bizet, Saint-Saëns, Bruneau, and Massenet? Is there, in fact, such a thing as a French 'national musical idiom'? If so, will some ardent partisan of nationalism kindly tell us what it is?

Then as to the communal evolution of the folk-song, he says:

The tacit assumption is always that it is bettered in the process, whereas in point of fact it may be worsened. Imagine, for example, the art of writing music on paper being lost, and a melody of Bach or Brahms being transmitted orally for some generations, often through people of comparatively undeveloped musical intelligence. There can be hardly the least doubt that it would be a worse piece of art at the end of the process than at the beginning. Moreover, Mr. Sharp admits that 'it is only very rarely that two singers (i.e., folk-singers) will be found to sing the same song in precisely the same form.' Which, then, is the 'communal' form. Which represents 'the national character'?

He remarks that:

Mr. Sharp thinks that 'folk-music is the ungarbled and ingenuous expression of the human mind, and on that account it must reflect the essential and basic qualities of the human mind.' The peasant's language may be supposed to do the same thing; but is Shakespeare or Swinburne therefore to speak no swifter and subtler tongue than this?

and his conclusion is that:

A good folk-song's only claim to respect is not that it is a folk-song, but that it is good.

He makes a general denial of nationality:

Is not, in fact, all this talk of 'national' music a little wild? Is there such a thing as 'the' Englishman, 'the' German, or 'the' Frenchman? It is a form of language, it is true, that we all use at times, but merely by way of a kind of shorthand, a swift generalisation that can do little harm so long as we remember that it is no more than that.

And as to the claim that our folk-song must be the basis of our national style he says:

'Suppose a composer never to have heard a folk-song in his life, how much worse off would he be? The enthusiasts who assert that there is some peculiar efficacy in the folk-song should be able to tell us precisely how its virtues act. Would the music of 'Gerontius' have been any the better if Elgar had known all the folk-songs of England, or any the worse if he had never known one of them? What light upon the problem of Gerontius's soul, dazed and shaken at the thought of death, can be thrown by 'Tarry trowsers' or 'I'm seventeen come Sunday,' or 'Mowing the barley'?

And he adds:

A modern English composer can have no more to learn from English folk-songs than from those of Germany or Hungary or Scandinavia, and no more to learn from the whole of them together than from Palestrina and Bach and Wagner and Strauss.

Mr. Sharp in his reply welcomes the discussion, and declares that if the case of the advocates of folk-song is a valid one, opposition will strengthen, not destroy it. As to Mr. Newman's views on the non-existence of nationality, he says:

See the absurdities to which this amazing denial leads! If nationality counts for nothing in music, then it was no more than the merest accident that Bach was a German, Verdi an Italian, or Debussy a Frenchman; that Grieg was not born in Italy, nor Schumann in France.

And further he draws an important distinction between nationality and race:

In citing Napoleon, Wellington, Beethoven, &c., as instances of men who were racially alien to the nations in which they became famous, Mr. Newman is surely confusing race with nationality. Beethoven had, it is true, Dutch blood in his veins, but his nationality was German. Napoleon, despite his Italian descent, was born a French subject, and in character was a typical Frenchman; while Wellington, though racially Irish, was by nationality an Englishman, if there ever was one.

Nationality is the controlling factor, not race. The American (U.S.A.) nation, for instance, is the homogeneous product of several races, an amalgam which has developed a clearly defined type, the characteristics of which differ materially from those of the constituent races of which it is the product.

And he asks:

Does Mr. Newman really believe that there is no relation, no artistic nexus, between, say, the themes of the first movement of Beethoven's Violin concerto and German folk-tunes, or between the tunes in Schubert's Müllerlieder and those in the Liederbuch?

and whether Wagner was wrong when he wrote:

'This world was longing to paint men again, to set men to sing—not pipes; so it seized the folk-tune for its purpose, and constructed out of it the opera-air' or untruthful when, speaking of the influences which governed him in his composition of 'The Flying Dutchman,' he said:

'I derived a reimbursement for my melody from the spirit of the folk-song. . . Already in that Ballad, I was governed by an instinctive feeling of the peculiarities of national Folk-melismus; yet more decisively in the Spinning-chorus, and most of all in the Sailors' Song' or whether Grieg was talking nonsense when, speaking of our English folk-songs, he said:

'They will doubtless be able to form the basis of a national style, as they have in other lands, those of the greatest musical culture not excepted'

To all this Mr. Newman, in his rejoinder, adds some more fuel to the fire of his arguments. He remarks that:

'It was no accident,' says Mr. Sharp, 'that Debussy is a Frenchman.' He evidently regards Debussy as typically French in just the same way that Bach was 'typically German.' Well, there is about as much in common between Debussy's music and folk-song as between a fancy-ball costume and a fig-leaf. Debussy developed the most characteristic elements of his present style comparatively late. They are said to have been suggested to him by the study of Russian composers, like Dargomijsky, and the improvisations of Russian gipsies. Gipsies! And not even French gipsies! And while Mr. Sharp is on the subject of Debussy as a typical Frenchman, I invite him to give us the national common denominator for Rameau, Couperin, Méhul, Berlioz, Gounod, Bizet, Saint-Saëns, Massenet, Godard, Fauré, d'Indy, Debussy, and Délibes, each of whom would be claimed as 'the' typical Frenchman by someone or other.

We will not presume here to hold the scales in balancing these conflicting arguments. Whoever is right, it is quite certain that communal thanks are due to Mr. Sharp for his great work of collecting and disseminating this form of our native art. That much of it is really beautiful cannot be gainsaid. We need not be very much concerned as to whether what is good has been fashioned into its present shape by an individual or the community; and whether this folk-music will really become the basis of a national art is a question for time and the gods to settle. It will have to drift into that channel naturally, or not at all.

THE OPERATIC 'IMPASSE.'

By Hermann Klein.

Art is at all times more or less in a state of transition. This is true of music as well as of painting or the drama; and in no branch of musical art is the law of constant change, slow and subtle though it be, more palpably illustrated than in opera. Style changes, taste changes, popular inclination changes. One school is succeeded by another, a new 'craze' by a newer one. And amid this gradual process of evolution, of development, of building up, the older forms do not become wholly lost. At each stage there is a 'survival of the fittest,' an addition to the permanent group of some new masterpiece that has achieved fame in its day, and then passed into the higher category of things which endure.

Of such masterpieces—ranging from those of Gluck and Mozart to the latest utterances of our own day—the repertory of every leading operatic institution must include its full representative share. Without a repertory so furnished and enriched, no opera-house can be worthy of either State aid or the support of individual subscribers. It may call itself a place of amusement first and an educational establishment afterwards; but even so it cannot be regarded as completely equipped for operatic purposes unless it is in a position to mount the best examples of every school and period, and provide a generous selection of them during the course of every season. Such a repertory, with all the traditions that appertain to it, cannot of course be built up in a year or two. The process necessarily occupies a long time, and, what is more, has to be begun in the right manner.

It was one of the chief weaknesses of Mr. Hammerstein's ill-starred campaign that he began at the wrong end. He did not even plunge in medias res. He started as though the conditions essential for the success of a new operatic enterprise—all but the actual locale itself—were already in existence and entirely favourable to his purpose. He did not dream, apparently, that he had to dig the foundations of something besides a building to be erected upon a plot of land rented from the London County Council, notwithstanding the interesting argument which he pleaded (as a reason for being charged a low ground rent) that the London Opera House was intended primarily as an educational institution. One may well ask now what was the educational value of a batch of exotic novelties sandwiched between as many hackneyed or half-forgotten operas, sung in Italian and French by artists of the second, third, or fourth rank, to be heard for most of the time at only the highest grand-opera prices!

This allusion to recent events must not be thought to savour of ingratitude. It is made, on the contrary, because the Kingsway experience was an instructive one; and we may not, where opera is concerned, hope to pave the way for better things unless we do so in the light of past history. It is generally agreed that the condition of operatic affairs in this country, and in London especially, is unsatisfactory in the extreme. Eliminate Covent Garden, and what is there? Include Covent Garden, and we are still worse off, in some respects, than many a small Continental city. The fact is admitted, and able writers are wont to deal with it from time to time in the critical and correspondence columns of the daily Press. Unfortunately, the memories of most of these writers are short. They know pretty well what has happened during the past ten or fifteen years. But of the struggles, the decline and renascence, the seasons of slow upward progress and brilliant promise through which opera pursued its chequered London career during the preceding quarter of a century, these writers—or certainly the majority of them—would seem to possess neither personal knowledge nor reliable second-hand information. If this were not the case, we should scarcely be told with such painful reiteration that the people of London have never in the main really cared for opera; that it is useless to try to educate the rising generation to love serious opera whilst they succumb to the glamour of musical comedy and the music-halls; above all, that there never was, and is not now, a popular demand for opera sung in English or, for that matter, in any language whatsoever.

Now these assertions are as inaccurate and unfounded as they are pessimistic and discreditable. True it is that the efforts made in recent years to popularise English opera in the Metropolis have not proved fruitful. True, also, that outside of the Covent Garden monopoly, with its Society subscription, its Wagner cycles, and its Puccini rights, no operatic undertaking of any kind has established a paying foothold in the centre of London. But history in this branch of music does not begin nor will it end with the events of this same period. What of the decade between 1875 and 1885, when Carl Rosa entered a deserted and apparently barren field? His was a hard struggle, but neither an unfruitful nor an unprofitable one. He always brought a talented, well-trained company, secured an unimpeachable ensemble, and gave fine performances, in English only, of all the popular works then in the repertory, from Mozart down to Wagner. His audiences were invariably large and enthusiastic, and the balance was only on the wrong side because the cost of novelties and new productions was debited to London, where they were brought out, and not to the provinces, where the real financial harvest was reaped. Unhappily, Carl Rosa died before his time, and his work was left unfinished.

What of the decade between 1886 and 1896, when Sir Augustus Harris restored the then fallen fortunes of Covent Garden and laid the foundations of the monopoly of to-day? Harris had already achieved two notable triumphs in the domain of opera. He brought the Hamburg (Pollini) troupe to Drury Lane in 1882, with Richter as conductor, mounting 'Tristan' and 'Die Meistersinger' for the first time here, along with the earlier Wagner works, with 'Der Freischütz,' 'Euryanthe,' &c. He demonstrated that there was a paying public for German opera well performed. He co-operated with Carl Rosa at the same house in '83 and '84, and took over the direction of the Carl Rosa company when its founder died, carrying it on successfully in addition to his own multifarious theatrical ventures.

Then came Sir Augustus Harris's third and greatest triumph, during the decade above referred to, when (in 1887) he was content to lose £10,000 by a brief four weeks' season at Drury Lane in order to show the world that there were still great singers to be heard in Italian opera and people in London interested enough to listen to them. That glorious defeat proved in the following year to have been a glorious victory for operatic enterprise of the kind since associated with Covent Garden. With Society at his back, Harris took the big house and, as with the drama at Drury Lane, converted a losing into a profitable game. Unhappily, he too died before his time, and since that untoward event occurred, in 1896, London has had no great impresario worthy of the name. Augustus Harris worked hard and unselfishly and with the right understanding, out of sheer love for that operatic art which our diffident public had almost forgotten how to appreciate and enjoy.

The memories of Carl Rosa and Augustus Harris may have faded somewhat, but I cannot believe that either worked in vain. Remember, these were the men who rid us of the ballad opera and gave us something better in its place. One proved that we had a huge public for opera sung in English; the other that we had cultivated audiences who liked to hear modern operatic masterpieces sung in the original German and French as well as in the all-grasping Italian. It is not credible that the broader and more popular section of the London public has either disappeared or lost its love of opera as presented through the medium of our native tongue. Indeed, managers like Mr. Charles Manners and Mr. Thomas Beecham have demonstrated the contrary—the former from the standpoint of cheap opera, the latter at a more expensive level of theatre prices. In neither case were the results wholly satisfying in a financial sense. Yet one manager showed that the so-called masses were ready and willing to be 'tapped' for English opera; the other that a tolerably successful appeal could be made to a combination of the 'masses' and the more cultivated classes.

What is the reason, then, why at this present moment the good ship English Opera lies stranded high and dry upon the Metropolitan shore, without apparent sign of a returning tide to float her off? The company founded by Carl Rosa still flourishes in the country and the suburbs, but avoids London proper, as does also the Moody-Manners organization. Mr. Beecham has retired from the fray, albeit he threatens a German campaign in the early spring at Covent Garden. Mr. Hammerstein loathed the very idea of condescending to give opera in English, even at the critical period when (for a consideration) he opened the portals of the London Opera House to 'The Children of Don.' What is the reason, the true cause, of all this fear and hesitancy in the face of obvious artistic duty and possible pecuniary reward?

Alas, there are many causes, many reasons, besides that tiresome explanation about musical comedy and the music-hall! The question is rather how and where to find the remedy for the condition of apathy that has supervened. I have little faith in State subsidies for opera, even if one could be obtained. If a National Opera House were endowed next year, I am sorely afraid that nothing short of an Act of Parliament would limit its activities to the fostering and building up of native lyric art. And such ideas are mere day-dreams. But unfortunately, so long as English opera has no home there will be no inducement—nay, no means or opportunity—for our best singers to undergo the thorough operatic training essential for the making of first-rate opera singers. So long, too, will there be no trouble taken to gratify English ears with less childish and ridiculous versions of foreign libretti, and—perhaps more important still—a clear, distinct, unadulterated pronunciation of the English text.

The average talent of native opera singers has undergone serious deterioration in the last few years. That it could be improved and raised to the highest level there is no doubt, provided the right conditions were forthcoming. The material is there, the milieu is not. The public is ready, the entertainment is not. In short, we have arrived at a kind of impasse, which will be neither penetrated nor overcome without the leadership of some genius full of energy and resource—some born impresario as deeply in sympathy with English opera and all that belongs to it as the great impresarios of the past were with its Italian progenitor. From what quarter such a being is to spring I know not; but if the need be real, that which has been demonstrated again and again in other fields of endeavour will also be made manifest in this. The hour will surely bring the man.

HEINE AND SOME MUSICIANS: A BLOT ON THE ESCUTCHEON.

By M.-D. Calvocoressi.

Although men of genius are known to have their failings, and to be, like all mortals, liable to err, it is no common experience to discover that a great artist, the loftiness of whose artistic ideals none would think of questioning, has committed acts of an irretrievably degrading nature. And, no doubt, to all admirers of Heine as a poet, the discovery of the fact that he on more occasions than one actually sank as low as blackmail will be unwelcome indeed. Unfortunately, one case has been established long ago, and another has this very month come to light.

That Heine attempted to blackmail Liszt is evident from the following letter, published by La Mara in her Briefe berühmter Zeitgenossen an Franz Liszt (Leipsic, 1895):

> 'I will await your visit, dearest friend, to-morrow between two o'clock and three. I have just written a first article, which I wish to send before your second concert. And perhaps it contains things that might not please you; therefore, it is quite suitable that I should previously have a talk with you.
> Your friend,
> [1844.] H. Heine.'

The 'talk' did not lead to satisfactory results for Heine. In her biography of Liszt—published, it should be remembered, under the composer's supervision—Mrs. Lina Ramann tells us that, presumably in 1844, Heine attempted to draw on Liszt for several thousand francs, but Liszt had refused, 'not caring to buy recognition on the market.' The letters to German periodicals written by Heine in that year (1844) are filled with rancorous and even insulting remarks on Liszt.

Although in this case the proof is strong enough—and, indeed, Liszt could never have descended to countenance slander, nor invented so improbable a tale—even more damning evidence has recently been found in a lot of autographs by a German dealer. It consists of seven letters of Heine to Meyerbeer, and of one of Meyerbeer to Heine, showing not only that the case of Liszt was not an exception, but also that all composers were not, like him, averse to 'buying recognition on the market.'

As far as Meyerbeer only is concerned, such proof was hardly needed. It is a known fact that he had made it a practice to bestow opportune liberalities on corruptible journalists. For instance, before the production of one of his operas he had sent to Fiorentino, a disreputable writer at the time acting as critic of the Constitutionnel, a thousand-franc banknote. At a time when another opera of his was to be produced, he sent the same Fiorentino five hundred francs. In his 'feuilleton' the critic, with ready wit, wrote that 'Meyerbeer's new opera was only half as good as the foregoing one.' So that Meyerbeer fell a ready victim to Heine.

In 1835, when the poet attempted his first extortions, he was on very friendly terms with the composer, whose praise he used to sing in lyric terms. He therefore approached him with great caution, speaking of certain enemies of Meyerbeer, to silence whom a sum of five hundred francs was necessary. He resorted to the same device several times. In 1842 the enemies are no longer 'starving Germans who plot in the dark,' but Escudier frères (the estimable publishers and editors of the weekly France Musicale). Heine, owing to his efforts on behalf of Meyerbeer, is out of pocket, and once more five hundred francs are needed.

Finding Meyerbeer credulous and ready enough, Heine thought it no longer necessary to take the trouble to invent bugbears. In 1844 he writes complaining that Meyerbeer leaves him without money: 'You have sent me two-hundred francs only. I accept the sum, however, because I believe that one should never refuse money. Do not the people who say I am devoid of principles know me very badly?'

In the same letter, he recommends warmly to Meyerbeer the brothers Escudier—probably forgetting what he had written previously.

A month later Heine warns Meyerbeer that Spontini was about to publish a libel, but adds that he, Heine, has taken all necessary steps to frustrate Spontini's designs.

Meyerbeer appears to have grown tired, after ten years, of his friend's expensive services, for Heine's last letter is in altogether a different tone:

> 'I cannot bear to have asked for a thing in vain. . . . I must say that I realise that, though you are a genius in music, it is in that respect only that one may admire and esteem you.'

Meyerbeer's answer is full of dignity. He is grieved, he writes, by Heine's letter. This bitterness is caused by the fact that his purse can no longer satisfy Heine's wishes. But he cannot so easily renounce Heine's friendship, and will continue to admire Heine's genius and to bear him faithful and devoted goodwill.

Scripta manent, says the proverb. And it is, alas! too true that besides so many beautiful writings, a few letters now remain, a blemish on the memory of Heine the man. It would not be, perhaps, altogether insidious criticism to connect the facts under notice with Heine's scepticism, with his ironical and blasé view of things in general. But who, when attempting to write on Heine, would not prefer to content himself with considering the 'Buch der Lieder' or the 'Romancero' in themselves?

The Classical Concerts Society announce ten Autumn concerts, to take place at Bechstein Hall (in afternoon and evening alternately), from October 16 to December 18. The artists engaged include the London, Klingler, and English String Quartets, and Señor Casals. The committee make an urgent appeal for support. The secretary is Mr. A. H. Robinson Smith, 7, Wigmore Street, Cavendish Square, London, W.

Occasional Notes.

Mr. Ernest Newman, in a letter that appears below, endorses our analysis of the musical evidence brought forward by the authors of 'An adventure' with the object of proving the truth of this remarkable story. If, after this, no satisfactory explanation of the musical difficulty gratuitously raised by the authors is forthcoming, we must conclude that the book is simply clever fiction. The letter is as follows :

Dear Sir,—I was greatly interested in your comments in the September number on the book entitled 'An Adventure,' published a year or so ago. The book came into my hands for the first time last month. I quickly drew the conclusion that it was a rather clever hoax, and I intended writing to you on the subject; but I first wanted to turn up some of the reviews of the book and find out whether any of the literary reviewers had come to the same conclusion. Your comments have forestalled mine, but I should like to press your point further home, and to ask the ladies who are responsible for the book to give the public the explanation that is certainly due.

My own suspicions were first aroused by the very completeness of the way in which every detail—as to costume and so on—that the ladies say they observed was afterwards confirmed by documentary research. One could hardly doubt that the thing was written backwards, like a detective story : that is, the authoresses had worked up the historical details and invented their 'experiences,' then narrated the 'experiences' as something hardly explicable, and then 'confirmed' the 'experiences' by research. It struck me that had they admitted a little error here and there we should have been more likely to believe the story. When, however, I came across those wildly ludicrous pages dealing with the phantom music that the ladies say they heard, my last shreds of credence vanished. What a sceptic would be inclined to say has happened is this : the ladies have been told that the musical pitch was lower in the 18th century than it is now. They therefore thought it would give verisimilitude to their narrative if they said they heard some music, and that it was in a lower pitch than ours. They evidently did not realise the absurdity of such a remark. I am told by a personal friend of one of the pseudonymous ladies that she is really musical. If so, no doubt she will be willing to try to explain away the central difficulty of her statement. If I know that a melody is written in A, but that it sounds, on a given instrument, as if it were in G or A flat, I can say at once that the pitch of the instrument is low. But no musician could listen to a piece of music he had never heard before, without any knowledge of the key in which it was supposed to be written, and say that 'the pitch was low.' The thing is so grotesque, to musicians, that I apologise for stating it at such length. I only do so to make it quite clear to the authoresses of 'An Adventure,' and to ask them to come to the rescue of a palpitating world with an explanation. The publishers (Messrs. Macmillan) were generous enough to vouch for the bona fides of the book. They too may like to have this point brought to their notice.—Yours sincerely,

Ernest Newman.

Perhaps the ladies would be kind enough also (1) to print the music they say they heard, (2) to give us the name of the 'expert' to whom they submitted it.—E. N.

At present the momentous question of the copyright of 'Parsifal' is attracting the attention of the whole musical world. According to law, the copyright, and the right of the Villa Wahnfried to proscribe all performance outside Bayreuth expire next year; according to Wagner's expressed wish, performances of 'Parsifal' should be for ever confined to Bayreuth. There is a widespread feeling in Germany that the composer's desire should be carried out. To strengthen this opinion, Hermann Bahr, whose wife is the famous Wagnerian singer, Frau Bahr-Mildenburg, has undertaken a lecture-campaign to pave the way for a special Bill in the Reichstag extending the copyright and performing rights. This movement has the enthusiastic support of Dr. Richard Strauss, who has created a sensation by publishing a letter of which the following is a translation :

As far as I am concerned there is only one side of the 'Parsifal' question—respect for the will of genius. Unfortunately, those who have the last word in the question of protecting 'Parsifal' are lawyers and politicians who, while desiring in their hearts to spread and ennoble our civilisation, have no comprehension of the rights of intellectual property. I have myself been present at debates in the German Reichstag in the course of which the representatives of the German nation, with a few rare exceptions, have discussed questions of the rights of authors and extensions of protection with enviable ignorance. I myself have heard a certain Herr Eugen Richter* have recourse to wicked misstatements in order to tread under foot the rights of two hundred pitiable German composers and the heirs of Richard Wagner. This state of things will not be altered so long as we have to suffer universal suffrage, so long as votes are counted instead of weighed, and so long as the vote of a Richard Wagner is not equivalent to the vote of a hundred thousand navvies. If it were, perhaps I might not hear talk about the rights of the German nation to rob, thirty years after his death, that genius whom it had banished and persecuted during his lifetime, and to prostitute his work on the smallest provincial stages. We may protest, but in vain. In two years the German 'bourgeois' can, between his dinner and his 'nightcap,' hear 'Parsifal' for sixpence as a change from the cinematograph show and the cheap musical comedy. And we wonder that the Italians and French reckon us as barbarians on all questions relating to products of the intellect !

Dr. Strauss's political opinions have aroused a storm of indignation, but one must admit he has the courage of his convictions. His attitude is not likely to win much sympathy in England. If the German 'bourgeois' will be able to do as Dr. Strauss predicts, so much the better for the 'bourgeois.' London contains keen Wagnerians by the thousand, and few of them can afford to go to Bayreuth. 'Parsifal' at Covent Garden is the one great boon they still have to long for.

An interesting article, by Caroline V. Kerr, in the Observer recently, threw some new light upon the nature of Strauss's new opera, 'Ariadne auf Naxos,' which, as our readers are doubtless aware, is incorporated in Strauss's incidental music to von Hoffmannsthal's version of Molière's 'Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme.' The writer says :

Readers of the Molière comedy will remember that the inglorious hero of the play is a certain M. Jourdain, who, in order to climb from his parvenu position, has surrounded himself with masters of the fine arts, including a maître de musique. This latter has a pupil whom he has succeeded in bringing to the attention of the rich Jourdain, and in the Hoffmannsthal version this composer is none other than the young Strauss. He has composed an opera, 'Ariadne auf Naxos,' which Jourdain has commanded to be performed at a soirée he is giving for the beautiful Marquise Dorimène. This young composer (alias Richard Strauss !) has a speaking rôle in the revised comedy, and a scene created for the purpose of focussing the attention of the audience upon him and his work affords an opportunity for the ventilation of views on the conditions of present-day music.

In the play it is arranged that 'Ariadne' shall be followed by a light musical piece of the nature of a harlequinade. M. Jourdain, however, decides that the possible boredom of his audience with a classical theme had best be avoided or mitigated by the simultaneous presentation of the two works.

* A famous Liberal Parliamentarian.

The young composer is frantic at the mutilation of his work, and finds but poor consolation in the irony of the dancing-master, who says: 'But would you not rather have your work heard in an abbreviated form than not heard at all? It is just the opportunities for judicious "cutting" which often contribute largely to the success of a work, and the first thing which a Court Intendant who is obliged to cater to a Royal patron asks about all opera is whether there are any good "cuts." It is high time that some clever musician should avail himself of this and intentionally compose a certain number of such passages in his score, so that when they are eliminated the work would remain as originally planned.' From this it will be seen that under cover of the stage Strauss is having his fling at the operatic managers of the present day.

It has long since been remarked that Strauss makes a new departure for every new work that he writes, and it still remains true.

The 'essay in dissonance' by Arnold Schönberg which was recently put before the public at a Queen's Hall Promenade Concert and moved it to laughter, hisses, and applause, was an acute instance of a new problem that is facing the critics of to-day. Past generations of critics unhesitatingly condemned the new and strange and unintelligible, and are now held up to pity and ridicule. If we pour scorn on our 'Futurist' school, are we preparing the same fate for ourselves? On the other hand the movement may be ephemeral and its supporters become known as the victims of a passing craze. At present we have no critical means to take the true measure of 'Futurist' music. All that we know is that it gives us no pleasure, and there is no harm in saying so. No London critic has taken kindly to Schönberg's 'Five orchestral pieces,' but one finds little of the lofty scorn and anger with which, for instance, Victorian critics rejected Wagner's music. Some have wisely taken the attitude of dispassionate examination of a curiosity.

We quote some remarks suggested by the Queen's Hall performance:

'There seems to be no good reason why a composer should not select dissonance as a medium, if he pleases, as an artist might state his problem in terms of magenta, or any other colour. Only he puts off the day of his appeal to the world at large. It was like a poem in Tibetan; not one single soul in the room could possibly have understood it at a first hearing. We can, after all, only progress from the known to the unknown; and as the programme writer, who had every reason to know, said, there was not a single consonance from beginning to end. Under such circumstances the listener was like a dweller in Flatland straining his mind to understand the ways of that mysterious occupant of three dimensions, man. As far, however, as it was possible to transcend one's limitations, the music seemed to be a study in textures. Considered as that alone there were some extremely interesting moments; and things were done with out-of-the-way combinations of instruments which were rare, at any rate, if not new. At some moments the music seemed more French than the Frenchmen, but at others a little heavy-handed, as if it was not quite certain that esprit had been got in exchange for geist. Whether it has a real message it is simply too early to say.'—The Times.

'Ugliness, in which Schönberg is supposed to specialise, is, to begin with, a relative thing, a thing of context, a thing that has very often a tremendous dramatic value. Upon the case of ugliness in music a jury of average intelligent listeners would be almost certain to disagree; you would possibly get three or four points of view from twelve men. And so when we are faced with a new "ugliness" we have to remember not merely the platitude that tastes differ, but that our intelligent fathers and grandfathers have been shocked at the dissonance in the overture to the "Meistersinger" or the wanton extravagance of Grieg's Pianoforte concerto . . . It is music well put together; form and contrast—two big things—are there, "ugliness" galore, "beauty" starved to death, sheer technical skill unsurpassed. And one may find in it, too, a certain humour and tenderness, and (at times) a certain hardness, that are after all not so very far removed from life. It is a "human document," bewildering enough, it is true, but human, and immensely personal to the writer himself.'—Daily Telegraph.

'The truth is that Schönberg has visions of possibilities in music for which neither he nor anyone else has as yet been able to find the right idiom. It is unquestionable that modern harmony can expand almost indefinitely. The problem is how to keep it still coherent and logical as it grows more subtle and complex. It must, like prose or poetry, talk sense, and, like painting, it must be recognisably veracious. The trouble is that you cannot test the truth of music as you can test the truth of poetry, or painting, or sculpture, by comparing it with any external original. Who, then, is to say what is right or wrong, false or true?'—Nation.

'It is best described as nature music. It is free and untrammelled by consideration of such things as distinctive themes, their logical development, or the relation of the harmonies one to the other. The composer works his sweet will, and leaves it to the hearer to make the most he can out of the result. The key to the understanding of this "music" is an acquaintance with open-air life, preferably in that part of the world where there are large quantities of live stock. The sounds they would add to those of nature are faithfully reproduced. This being so, the members of the audience, many of them newly returned from holiday-making in the country, were able to appreciate the realism.'—Morning Post.

'It would be idle to pretend that there was nothing to admire in the ingenious interweaving of themes; and the composer's novel harmonic progressions and fertile, almost fiendish, ingenuity in scoring, contained much that was strange and stimulating. But to listen with the heart was quite another matter. For the music resembled the dismal wailings of a tortured soul, and suggested nothing so much as the disordered fancies of delirium or the fearsome, imaginary terrors of a highly nervous infant.'—Globe.

'They are formless, incoherent, disjointed, and utterly defiant of all preconceived ideas of what constitutes music. The first piece suggested to me that the composer was endeavouring to illustrate the various sounds heard at feeding-time at the Zoological Gardens. The second number was less aggressive in character, and the suggestion of hypochondriacal melancholia was intensified by the abortive attempt of a solo viola to get through some kind of theme. In the third section the composer would seem to be experimenting with changing dissonances irrespective of any significance. Up to the fourth movement the audience on Tuesday had listened to the various effects as a burlesque on modern orchestration, and more than once a ripple of laughter went through the hall; but with the fourth number the want of ideas and continued vagueness became wearisome, and this developed into absolute boredom in the Finale.'—Referee.

We notice with amusement that the gentle sarcasm of the Morning Post has, apparently, been taken too seriously by a certain writer, who complains of the vain ambitions of modern programme music!

Some high prices were paid for musical manuscripts forming part of the Sophie Schnerder collection that was recently sold by auction in Berlin. An unpublished Canon by Beethoven was sold for £50, and another Beethoven manuscript, containing his 'Busslied' and 'Gottes Macht und Vorschung,' fetched £150. A letter from Beethoven to Ritter von Türkheim Seilersteg changed hands at £31. The sum of £37 10*s.* was paid for a letter of Leopold Mozart, and the 'Historic' Museum in Cologne bought the autograph of a Rondo by Mozart for £100.

We read that Mr. Hiram Henton, the conductor of the Eastbourne Municipal Orchestra, insists on conducting with his obverse to the audience and his reverse to the performers. That may mean that he has not the courage to face the music, or that he finds the view from the ordinary way of standing monotonous and uninspiring, or that he thinks his office as conductor is purely ornamental, and being so he may as well exhibit himself to the audience to the best advantage. Of course this oddity does not matter much to the band because, so like a band, they may not trouble even to look at the conductor. Some players in orchestras we have known, would not recognise their conductor if they met him in the street. We are not suprised to hear that the Town Council objects to the innovation. It seems to us that compromise is the only fair way out of the difficulty. Why should not Mr. Henton conduct sideways?

The Birmingham Festival opens on October 1. We remind our readers that the programme includes 'Elijah,' Elgar's new cantata, 'The Music Makers,' a new Symphony by Sibelius (October 1); Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion, Dr. Walford Davies's new cantata, 'The song of St. Francis,' Mr. Granville Bantock's new orchestral work,* 'Fifine at the Fair,' Strauss's 'Don Quixote' (October 2); 'The Messiah,' Verdi's 'Requiem,' Delius's 'Sea-drift' (October 3); Brahms's 'Requiem,' and Elgar's 'The Apostles' (October 4). We are informed that the promised performance of Scriabine's 'Prometheus' has been abandoned.

THE PROBLEM OF COMBINING VIOLIN AND PIANOFORTE IN COMPOSITION.

By Marion M. Scott.

[A paper read at the Composers' Conference, held by Society of Women Musicians on July 5, 1912.]

Some problems present themselves from the outset as being of considerable magnitude: others are distressingly shy and elusive. They hide behind an appearance of exquisite simplicity, or so reduce their bulk that the unwary person hardly realises their existence, much less their power, till his work has been checked and thwarted. For instance, any one can see that writing a concerto for violin and orchestra presents a formidable problem; but to write a solo, or even a sonata, for violin and pianoforte, appears simple and straightforward. It is indeed the very thing which, next to songs, enters most often into a composer's experience. Nevertheless it presents a problem, and one which has frequently caused a good deal of difficulty. But all problems, whether they be colossal or diminutive sphinxes, give us one right in common—the right to solve them if we can. And though space forbids that this paper should be anything more than a series of fingerposts to the conditions of the problem and its solution, I can at least plead this—that the points touched on are those which have fallen within my own experience when either writing, playing, or listening.

Now it seems to me that when we attempt to combine the violin and pianoforte in a composition, the problem has a dual nature—on the one side a sort of spiritual difficulty arising from the fact that there is a merciless clarity about the combination of sound which shows up any defect in inspiration; on the other a very natural, human difficulty, brought about by the innate difference in race and character between the two instruments. Of the spiritual difficulty I shall not speak—each composer must work out his or her own salvation; but as regards the other part of the problem, I think it is our business not only to know but to control the difficulties, and when possible to turn them to good account. The power to do so can be acquired by sympathetic study of the instruments, their history, and those compositions which have been handed down to us by generations of high-hearted composers; and last, but not least, by direct personal experiments, which are invaluable, though not always pleasant! It must be remembered that the violin came to maturity over two hundred years ago, and that the fiddles we most value nowadays were made by the great Italian makers in the first half of the 18th century. For beauty of tone and subtlety of response, the violins of Stradivarius and Guarnerius remain unrivalled, and the only practical difference between them then and now lies in the adjustment of bridge and sound-post, and the greater length of neck, the modern adjustment giving increased brilliance and sonority to the tone. No sooner had the violin come to maturity, than there followed a rapid expansion of violin technique, brought about by those fine old Italian violinists who simultaneously developed the resources of their own instrument and of harmonic form.

The pianoforte, on the other hand, was quite a hundred years behind the violin. When the latter was perfect, the pianoforte was still a potentiality, and up to the time of Mozart, violin sonatas were usually accompanied either on the clavichord or harpsichord. The first had a sympathetic but very weak tone, which has been compared to a disembodied spirit, and it has been said that only two or three people could enjoy it at the same time. The harpsichord was more powerful and brilliant, but had no richness or singing quality. In either case it would have been impossible for them to overpower the violin, though as the accompaniment usually consisted of a figured bass to be filled in by the player at will, we have rather to guess at what was done.

The pianoforte made its way tentatively at first, but from about 1770, when Clementi published works written on the true lines of pianoforte technique, the instrument began to assert its importance, and by the time of Beethoven things had advanced so far that there was no disparity in technique between it and the violin. Since then the whole trend of development in the pianoforte has been towards greater volume, roundness, and brilliance of tone, and at the present day it can easily make itself heard against the clamour of a full orchestra.

Here, then, are the two instruments as we have them. The violin, which is (as Sir Hubert Parry says) 'a single-part instrument—a singing instrument with great capacity for enlivening and adorning its cantabile with brilliant passages,' and the pianoforte, which has an almost unlimited capacity for harmony, and is rich in polyphonic, rhythmic, and melodic possibilities, but possesses the disability that it cannot sustain a note for any length of time with a steady tone.

Having thus set before us these two personalities, the way is cleared towards an understanding of how far either of them can command the fundamentals of music—melody, harmony, and rhythm.

In Melody the violin is easily first, and when we consider that in its ultimate result melody is the most powerful means a composer possesses for expressing and evoking emotion, it will be seen that the violin wields a very potent power.

The pianoforte can do far less in this direction, but in Harmony it is in its element, full of splendid achievements and possibilities, of rich and subtle chords—of great climaxes of sound—which are absolutely unapproachable by the violin.

In Rhythm, however, the two instruments meet on nearly equal terms.

*We are obliged to hold over the analysis of this work promised last month.

From this it will be seen that it is easier to write a violin solo with pianoforte accompaniment than it is to reverse the process and let the violin accompany the pianoforte—easier also than to yoke the instruments evenly together in a contrapuntal movement. All these ways are good and possible, but there remains a fourth, better than all—that is, to combine the instruments on terms of equal interchange, of free give and take, of complete co-operation when necessary. This last way really includes all the others, and is the plan upon which all the great sonatas have been written.

It is impossible this evening to do more than indicate some of the questions which confront a composer as soon as he begins to compose, but I will select a few which are connected with each of the ways of writing I have just mentioned.

First, then, in a violin solo with pianoforte accompaniment, what should be the relation between the two instruments as to the pitch of notes used? Sir Charles Stanford, in his delightful book on Composition, gives this excellent rule, that the pianoforte should never play the same successive notes in unison with the violin. He says: 'There is a basis of quarrel between them at the start, for the pianoforte is tuned in the tempered scale, where every interval except the octave is out of tune, and the violin plays in the pure scale. This quarrel has to be smoothed over temporarily when they join forces, and the causes of friction have to be avoided as much as it is possible to avoid them. The accomplished violinist will adapt himself at critical moments to the cast-iron requirements of the pianoforte, but the occasions when he has to accomplish this difficult volte-face must be minimized by the experience and common-sense of the composer. He ought, for instance, to avoid giving the stringed instrument passages of melody in unison with the keyed, assigning them to another octave if they require reinforcement . . . A soloist does not want his steps dogged at every turn, or his imperceptible rubatos mechanically defined as he makes them . . . The accompaniment therefore must allow for elasticity.'

I have quoted at some length, but the point is a vital one. The violin must have a little space in a score in which to breathe, so to speak. Beautiful as are Schumann's sonatas for violin and pianoforte, their full effect is always clouded by this lavish doubling in the unison. As an example, I propose to play the second subject of the A minor Sonata, where the pianoforte literally dogs the violin. Towards the end, notice the sudden sensation of freedom and delight when the violin holds a long note, and the pianoforte moves beneath it independently.

(Illustration: Sonata in A minor, Schumann, 1st movement, second subject.)

To turn now to those occasions when the pianoforte takes the solo part and the violin accompanies, we find a more difficult situation to deal with, for whether the pianoforte has the main thematic material in either the treble or the bass, the violin is very apt to attract most attention on account of its tone-colour. There are various ways of circumventing this difficulty—for instance, by making the violin play in its weakest part—i.e., on the D string, while the pianoforte uses its richer notes; or by giving the violin plenty of rests in its part; or by giving it long, even notes, and centring all the rhythmic interest in the pianoforte. When a melody is in the middle and upper registers of the pianoforte, it is generally convenient to put the violin at some little distance below, as it has a trick of blotting out the tone-colour in those notes on the pianoforte which are sounded close to the notes it is sounding itself. The violin is not of much use as the middle part in a succession of chords, and often produces very unexpected results when so used. As an example, I should like to show you a passage from Beethoven's Sonata in G, Op. 96, where the disturbing effect of the violin in the middle of the sixths on the pianoforte can only be adjusted by the most perfect ensemble between the players.

(Illustration: Sonata in G major, Op. 96, Beethoven, 1st movement.)

There is one way in which the violin can be very useful as the middleman, however, and that is when a passage is written for the pianoforte at its two extremes of bass and treble, and the warm tone of the violin used in the centre of this empty space seems to bridge the void. There is a very good example in the first movement of Beethoven's D major Trio.

In contrapuntal writing I am inclined to think that quick movements are more successful in effect than slow ones—the points of imitation are most readily recognised when they flash out in rapid repartee; and also in quick passages, and particularly in staccato ones, the violin resigns some of its characteristic sustaining power. In slow contrapuntal movements, where the melodic interest is far stronger than the rhythmic, the pianoforte is at a disadvantage—it cannot sustain long notes. The first movement of Bach's Sonata in B minor is a case in point—notice what a feature he makes of the long notes in the violin, the pianoforte meantime moving freely through a succession of harmonies. Then notice what happens near the end of the movement, where the parts are reversed. The long notes on the pianoforte hardly sound at all—they are almost an imaginary effect. But in the second movement the incisive subject-matter is exchanged between the instruments most successfully.

(Illustration: 1st and 2nd movements from Sonata in B minor, Bach.)

Sonata-writing offers the fullest possibilities to a composer; it is a whole world in itself, where many things have to be taken into consideration, and I can only touch on very few of them here. But I should like to emphasise the necessity for rhythm and variety of rhythm. For instance, we all of us realise that it is very convenient, when writing in sonata form, to have one subject at least which can be freely passed from one instrument to another without being marred by the transference, and it is just here that rhythm is such a help, as it is possessed in full measure by both violin and pianoforte.

In the matter of accompaniment figures, great allowance has to be made for the individuality of each instrument, a sort of free translation often having to be given. For instance, quick repeated notes are perfectly easy on the fiddle, but are very difficult on the pianoforte, while broken chords are easy on the pianoforte and difficult on the violin. The first movement of Mozart's Sonata in F offers an excellent illustration of this, the repeated notes for the violin being turned into a broken chord-passage on the pianoforte. If any one wishes to get an idea of how perfectly these passages are suited to the instruments let him try playing the violin passage on the pianoforte and vice-versâ—the results are startling.

(Illustration: Sonata in F, Mozart, 1st movement.)

With regard to such special effects as pizzicato and double stopping on the violin, a good deal of uncertainty often prevails, but it is pretty safe to reckon that thirds and sixths are effective so long as they are not in very quick time, and do not go higher than D in alt. It is just as safe to reckon that octaves are difficult, and seldom very effective. On the pianoforte they are delightful—the only intervals which are really in tune. On the violin they are hardly ever in tune, and do not correspond in the least to pianoforte octaves.

Pizzicato is far more an effect for the string quartet and orchestra than for a sonata, as the short length of violin strings prevents that freedom of sound possessed by a 'cello or harp. When pizzicato is used on the violin, it is a good rule to remember that it is most effective over the range of notes from G below middle C (the violin's lowest note) to D in alt. It is but seldom that pizzicato sounds well against the pianoforte, though when the peculiar conditions are fully realised and turned to advantage, it is possible to produce beautiful results. I propose showing you two examples, the first from Brahms's Sonata in G major, where the violin accompanies the pianoforte with pizzicato chords which are generally ineffective when heard from even a short distance. The second is from Schumann's Sonata in D minor, where the evanescent tone-effect is deliberately used to give an almost impalpable quality to the theme on its appearance.

Before I conclude, I should like to say just one word as to future possibilities. The harmonic range of music has been enormously widened of late, and the pianoforte has already benefited very greatly in the music written for it. So far little has been done for the violin; yet surely new types of melody and ornamentation must be inherent in these new harmonies. It rests with present-day composers to discover and develop them.

Church and Organ Music.

THE EARLY HARMONIZED CHANTS OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

By S. Royle Shore.

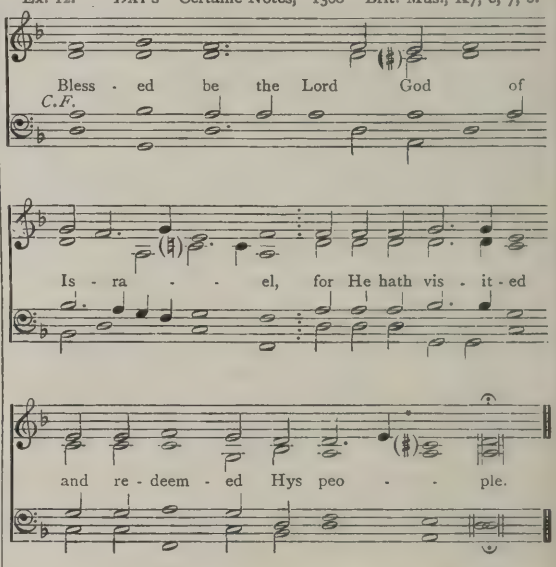
After the chants in the Edwardine Choir-book of 1547, and those of Tallis in the Barnard manuscript and printed collections of 1625 and 1641 respectively, must be considered the interesting and varied chants set to the Canticles in the collection of John Day. This was first published in 1560, soon after the accession of Queen Elizabeth, under the title of 'Certaine Notes set forthe in foure and three partes, to be song at the Mornynge, Communion and Evening Praier, &c." The full significance of this publication, as being the sole printed Service Book of the Church (after the little-used Merbecke Plain-chant Book of 1550) from 1560 to 1641, has never been fully realised. All else was sung from manuscript, save a certain number of anthems which were printed much later, and the metrical Psalmnody, which was outside the purview of the great choral foundations. Within four years of the publication of Barnard the choirs were dispersed under the Great Rebellion; but few copies of Day or Barnard survived the wholesale destruction of choir-music, and many traditions were lost. The character of some of the settings of the Canticles in Day seems to have been entirely overlooked. The absence of any accessible score of the four part-books of Day has certainly contributed to this.

The collection contains three full services. Two, including Communion services, are by Causton, one for men and the other for mixed voices. The remaining service is by Heath, morning and Communion, supplemented by two settings of the evening Canticles by Whitbroke and Knight, about whom nothing apparently is known.

The service which first concerns us is the 'Te Deum' by Heath. This has been described as 'an extremely dull service' in 'purely syllabic harmony, entirely rhythmless apart from the words,'* an experiment which never seems to have been repeated. The 'Te Deum' is founded on the well-known Ambrosian chant-setting of this hymn, which forms the tenor throughout.

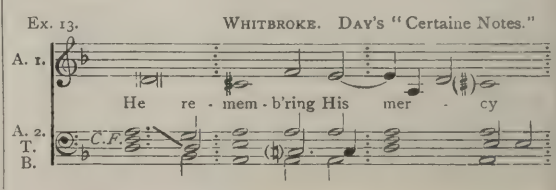
Of more musical interest is the setting of Thomas Causton (d. 1569) for the 'Benedictus' of his Morning service for men's voices. It is based on the form of the 'Tonus Peregrinus,' to which reference was made in the first part of this article. The melody is, of course, in the tenor. With certain variations, the chant continues through the Canticle in this form. It should be stated that the distribution of the syllables at the end of phrases is hardly ever clearly indicated. This is the rule with the music of the period. The counter-tenors change position in alternate verses. This thoughtful provision for the interest and relief of the singers was not then uncommon in church music:

Ex. 12. Thomas Causton (d. 1569). Day's "Certaine Notes," 1560 Brit. Mus., K7, e, 7, 8.

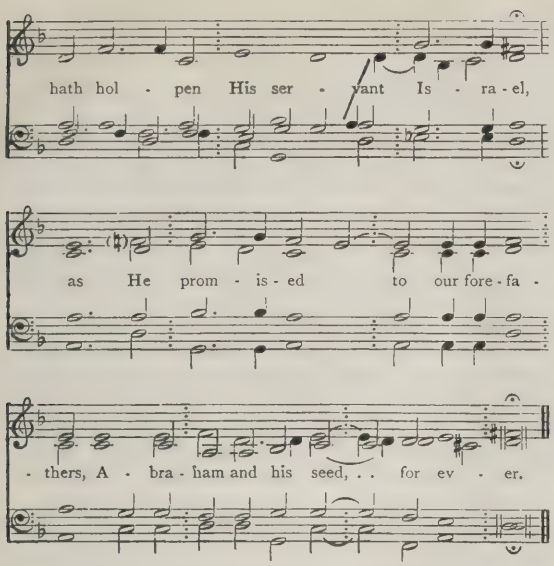


Of even more interest is the 'Magnificat' by Whitbroke on the solemn form of the 1st Tone. Our plain-chant experts seem to have overlooked the post-Reformation use of these elaborate Tones. In view of the length of the melody, the composer, save in the long verse about to be quoted, distributes it usually over two or three verses. The scoring for the second counter-tenors in the first part of the chant should be noticed. The composer takes the voices down to tenor C, and at one point even below the bass. The treatment of the alto voice by the composers of the time is frequently the despair of editors. The use of the whole-tone scale in the first alto part at the conclusion should give adequate satisfaction to the moderns:

Ex. 13. Whitbroke. Day's "Certaine Notes."

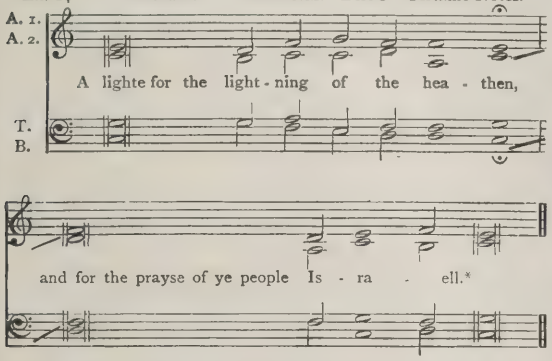


* Dr. Ernest Walker's 'History of Music in England' (1907), p. 37.



As it would minister to posthumous pride to record the virtues only of old composers, it is right to point out that they had their weak moments. Whitbroke, as the quotation from his 'Magnificat' seems to suggest, may have been capable of great things, but the following 'Nunc dimittis' chant—happily the Canticle is a short one—will hardly redound to his credit :

Ex. 14. Attributed to WHITBROKE. DAY'S "Certaine Notes."



Perhaps it was the lack of any plain-chant foundation which unsteadied the composer. The second half of the chant is perhaps the more remarkable. His apparent disdain of the octaves between the bass and second alto at the junction of the two halves of the chant, might have led to the design of a vigorous chord for the reciting note of the second half, but it has not this 'redeeming vice.' The cadence, anticipating mid-Victorian sugar by some three centuries, is wonderfully in advance of the times. The octaves, although there is no actual break, may perhaps be considered to be covered by a rule not generally recognised in English text-books, but well expressed in Amédée Gastoué's 'Traité d'Harmonisation du Chant Grégorien' (Janin Frères, 10, Rue Président-Carnot, Lyon), p. 42 : 'Les octaves et les quintes qui se produisent entre deux phrases ou coupes de phrase ne sont pas comptées comme telles.' Whether Tallis, in his chant (Ex. 11, quoted earlier in this article) could plead this for his octaves, in the absence of any real break, is perhaps questionable. It is fair to point out that though the 'Nunc dimittis' follows the 'Magnificat,' Whitbroke's name is not appended to it. Judging by the version of the 'Nunc dimittis' used, which does not agree with any Edwardine or Elizabethan text, the Canticle and chant may have been the result of some Henrician or Edwardine anticipation of the vernacular by an unknown composer, and included just as they were, without due editorial consideration, in Day's collection. (See also the observations on Examples 6 and 7.)

* The distribution of the syllables is uncertain.

A setting in rather long notes, from Knight's 'Magnificat,' is an early and more successful attempt than the foregoing to break away from a plain-chant basis. Some touches of modernity are interesting. The chant form is not maintained throughout. The composer even introduces polyphony in some of the verses.

As an ecclesiastical writer George Marson is quite forgotten ; but he left services behind him and several settings of the Psalms. The latter are not of supreme interest, but the following extract should perhaps be given. There is some weak harmony between a and b, owing to the composer's consciousness of the temptation to write fifths between the tenor and bass, which those familiar with the Litany Response here reproduced will appreciate. He uses no reciting notes, but reduces or increases the length of the chant according to circumstances. This is a fair type of other psalm chants, or rather psalm settings, of the period :

GEORGE MARSON, fl. 1601.
BARNARD'S MS. Collection, 1625.
Royal College of Music.

Ex. 15.

Thomas Morley, in his settings of the Psalms, is not perhaps quite at his best. These are, however, much more in chant form than Marson's, and the harmony is more striking, but not so satisfying as some of the broad ecclesiastical harmonies to the Psalm Tones set out in his 'Plaine and Easie Introduction to Practicall Musicke' (1597).

The chants of John Holmes are distinctly interesting. The following example has elements which should tend to make it popular, if choirs would take the trouble to tackle the extended cadences :

JOHN HOLMES, (d. 1638).
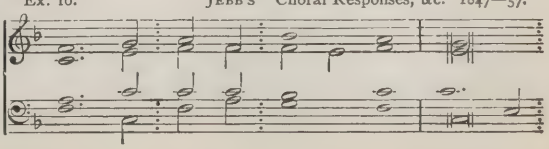
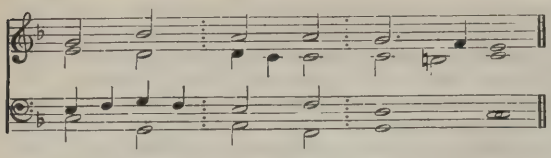
JEBB'S "Choral Responses, &c." 1847—57.

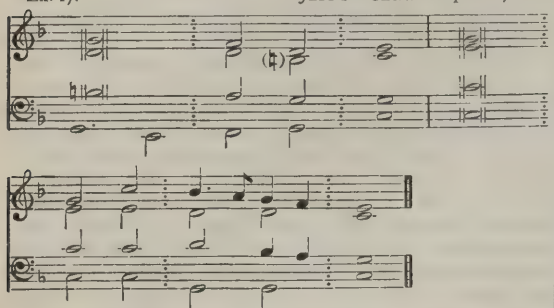
Ex. 10.





The following, however, cannot make claim to any ecclesiastical propriety; and the composer's startling method of saving an octave between the extreme parts is not for students' eyes, and is communicated in the strictest confidence:

Ex. 17. John Holmes. Jebb's "Choral Responses, &c."



He evidently had good basses in his choir, because sometimes the bass parts in some of his psalms go down to bottom C and remain there. The pitch of course was higher than it is at present.

There is something quite splendid about this chant of Thomas Tomkins:

Ex. 18. Thomas Tomkins (d. 1656). Jebb's "Choral Responses," &c.

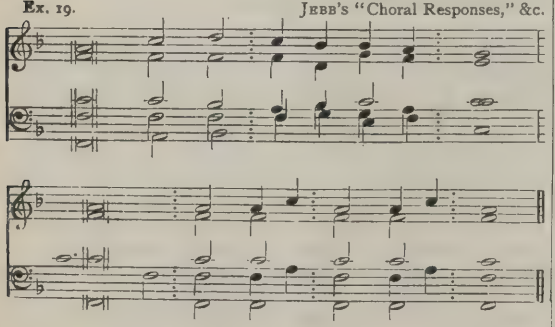
For a composer who could do such very good work, the following composition is probably unique:

Ex. 19. Thomas Tomkins. Jebb's "Choral Responses," &c.



It is fair to say that this is ear-marked for Psalm xlvii., v. 5, and musicians of the day were perhaps accustomed to let themselves go in verses of this description. (See Ex. 21A.)

Mr. F. G. F. Thomas, of Weston Hall, Towcester, writes:

The following brief description of our old organ may possibly be of interest to your readers, some of whom may be able to suggest for it a likely date and builder.

The organ was originally built for the Heber family, and was played by Bishop Heber on frequent visits before he went out to India. Here he is said to have composed his tune to the well-known hymn 'From Greenland's icy mountains.'

During the years 1877-1910 the Hall was let to tenants, one of whom found the organ de trop and consigned it to the lodge cottage, and finally it found harbourage in the church; but as the pipes had during these transitions suffered damage, and some were even wrongly placed, it is no wonder that it was not well appreciated. For some years, in order to make room for a more modern organ, it blocked up the vestry, and the present owner of the Hall on coming into residence was requested to remove it to its original position. It had in the meantime been seen by experts, who pronounced it 'an exceedingly interesting antique.' The removal and entire restoration were entrusted to Mr. H. W. Balsar Ludwig, of Banbury, who has made of it, to quote his own words, 'a lovely thing.'

It is a chamber organ, with one manual, ten stops, and an antique shifting movement which reduces the tone without withdrawing the stops, some of which, e.g., the stopped diapason and principals, are of singular sweetness. The keys are white sharps, with black centre lines, and black naturals. The action is easy and quick. The bellows are of a very old construction, and needed much repair. In addition to the side-lever for hand-blowing, Mr. Ludwig has cleverly contrived a pedal-bar, which can be attached to the bellows in front for self-blowing, and which works easily considering the size of the organ. No maker's name or date has been discovered, but the construction seems to point to about 180 years ago. The specification is as follows:

Stops, and their compass.

Bass Side.	Pipes	Treble Side.	Pipes
Twelfth	26	Cremona Treble Mid. C♯ to top	28
Sesquialtera	52	Fifteenth	28
Fifteenth	26	Cornet	56
Principal	26	Principal	28
Stopped Diapason complete	54	Open Diapason	28
	184		168
		Total pipes	352

Antique shifting pedal movement.

Fine old case, with front row of gilded metal pipes (included in above specification and in use).

BIRMINGHAM CATHEDRAL.

During the week of the Birmingham Musical Festival, there will be sung to one of the psalms at each of the 5.30 week-day Evensongs, some of the harmonized chants by Tallis, Tomkins, and Holmes, which were in use before the Commonwealth era, and have been the subject of articles in this and the preceding number of the Musical Times, and are about to be published by Novello & Co. as settings for the evening Canticles. Amongst the services to be sung will be some by the Elizabethan composers, Mundy and Causton, and John Ward, a contemporary of Gibbons. These are polyphonic, in two instances very polyphonic, in style. They are quite unlike the services of the period which have come down to us in the Cathedral tradition, and have probably not been heard since 1645. An annotated service list is about to be issued by the Cathedral authorities.

LIVERPOOL.

The question as to who will be appointed to succeed the late Dr. A. L. Peace as City Organist continues to excite considerable attention. There are fifty-nine applicants for the post, including Mr. E. H. Lemare, who refuses to undergo any competitive test. A number of letters, cogent and otherwise, have appeared in the daily Press on the subject, and Mr. Lemare's popularity has been shown by a numerously-signed petition in favour of his appointment, which has been forwarded to the municipal authorities. On the other hand, it is thought that there would be nothing derogatory to any candidate's dignity or reputation in submitting to the formal conditions. The names of Mr. Edward Watson, Mr. Bernard Johnson, and Dr. Stanley Dale are to be added to the list of players who have appeared at St. George's Hall since the last report.

One of the most interesting of the musical events which mark the Winter season is the annual Festival of the Church Choir Association. This is fixed for November 21, and at the present time the choirs of twenty churches, selected in order of priority of application, who will combine in a choir of 605 voices, are busily engaged preparing the music. Profiting by the experience of eleven previous Festivals the committee, with a view still further to perfect the performances, have reduced the number of choral items to six. Sir George Martin has promised to conduct his Te Deum in B flat, written for the Coronation Thanksgiving Service in St. Paul's; also his fine anthem, 'Rejoice in the Lord,' and beautiful unaccompanied 'Holiest, breathe an evening blessing,' which will be bracketed with Farrant's 'Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake,' as typically representative of ancient and modern English church music. As in previous years, this important annual undertaking, which affects church people and church music in a wide area, is indebted to the able services of its hon. secretary, Mr. Ralph H. Baker, who, it may be added, has recently been appointed Vice-Consul in Liverpool for Guatemala.

The annual Festival Service of the Queen Victoria Clergy Fund and Clergy Pensions Institution (Southwark Diocesan branches) will take place at Southwark Cathedral on October 7, at 7.30 p.m. The Finale of Act I. of 'Parsifal' will be performed by the Cathedral choir, under the direction of Mr. E. T. Cook, organist of the Cathedral; the Bishop of Worcester will preach. The greater part of the Cathedral will be open to the public without tickets. Applications for reserved places should be made to the Diocesan Secretary, Mr. Richard Lemaire, 'Kilgraston,' Purley.

Mr. A. E. Brent Smith has been appointed assistant music-master at Lancing College. He received his musical education from Mr. Ivor Atkins, organist of Worcester Cathedral. He was a chorister at the Cathedral from 1900 to 1904, when he left to take up a King's Scholarship at the King's School. In 1907 he became articled to Mr. Ivor Atkins, and in recent years has been assistant-organist of the Cathedral.

To celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the well-known Robert College, Constantinople, a new organ is to be erected by Messrs. Norman & Beard at a cost of £1,500.

A new organ by Messrs. Norman & Beard, erected in the Palm Court at Messrs. Selfridge's, was opened on September 19 by Mr. E. H. Lemare.

Reviews.

Handbook of music and musicians. Nelson's Encyclopædic Library. By H. Wharton Wells.

[Thomas Nelson & Sons.]

Encyclopædias and dictionaries of music abound, and still they come. Each new one differs in scope, manner, and design from all of its predecessors, and therefore 'supplies a long-felt want.' The special qualities of Messrs. Nelson's 'handbook' are physical and literary compactness and a combination of reticence and completeness. It may be said to answer all questions that arise from a musician's daily round, and to contain little or nothing that he need not know. Mr. Wells has an enviable faculty of concise and lucid explanation that gives value to the book, and additional explicitness is gained by the copious use of musical and pictorial illustrations. It is true that some of the former,—for instance, the examples of modulation,—might be improved upon. But pedagogic modulation has always been an unmusical thing. The handbook is an up-to-date glossary of theory, harmony (without mention of the whole-tone scale), form, rhythm (with thesis but not arsis), elementary acoustics, musical instruments, and foreign terms, and the last eighty pages are devoted to short biographies of the world's musicians. The merit of this portion is qualified by some strange omissions. There is no mention of Hans Richter, Henry Wood, August Manns, Busoni, Ysaye, Paganini, Sarasate, d'Indy, Bruckner, Mahler, Borodin, or any Bach but John Sebastian, although in every sphere here represented lesser names are included. Eugen d'Albert appears as a notable violinist as well as a pianist. Compilers of dictionaries are no less human than ourselves, and we hope our remarks will be received, not as condemnation, but as suggestions for a second edition. The handbook is undoubtedly good and useful.

Opera Stories. By Filson Young.

[Grant Richards, Ltd.]

Books of opera plots are as a rule dull reading (readers of last month's Musical Times will recall an exception), and often leave an opera-goer as much in the dark as to the greater part of the plot as before. Mr. Filson Young is among the few who have tackled the problem with full regard to utility and literary value, and he has devised a method which, successful in his 'Wagner Stories,' is retained in the 'Opera Stories.' He adopts the past tense, and with narrative, description, and dialogue he unfolds in the form of a short story the same series of ear- and eye-impressions that are presented to the opera-goer. No essential is omitted and no extraneous comment or explanation inserted. An admirable instance of the method is the opening of Mr. Young's 'Aïda' story :

'"Yes," said the high priest, "the Ethiopians are said to be preparing to attack us again ; I shall soon hear the truth from the messengers."

'He was standing in the hall of the king's palace at Memphis, a place beautiful with lofty columns through which could be seen the gate of the temple of Isis. The pyramids in the distance stood out sharply against the blue sky, and all the forecourt of the palace was full of the scent of flowering shrubs. Radamès, the captain of the king's guard, had come to consult the high priest about this war ; and he was also anxious to know if the goddess had decided who was to be leader of the Egyptian army. But Ramphis only looked significantly at the young captain, saying, "Yes, she has spoken, and I am now going to tell her wishes to the King." And he went off in the direction of the palace.

'What if it were Radamès himself who had been chosen? He stood there wondering and hoping, and thinking of his beautiful Aïda, to whom he longed to bring back laurels and rewards.'

Under this treatment even the plot of 'The magic flute' is made readable (especially as there is no preliminary essay on Freemasonry).

The operas dealt with are 'Faust,' 'Carmen,' 'The magic flute,' 'Don Giovanni,' Aïda,' 'Madam Butterfly,' 'The Bohemians,' 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' 'Pagliacci,' and Hänsel and Gretel.' The price is five shillings.

Aus dem Kreise Wieck-Schumann. By Marie Wieck.

[Pierson, Dresden and Leipsic.]

These memoirs and reminiscences by Madame Clara Schumann's half-sister, while making small claim to literary excellence, contain much that is of real interest. Apart from the description of many well-known incidents in the lives of Robert and Clara Schumann, they give a very good impression of the interesting personality of the writer's father, Friedrich Wieck, once famous as a pianoforte teacher. He is portrayed with more sympathy and, we should imagine, justice, then in much of the existing Schumann literature. For once we get, from Wieck's side, a plausible, if not always very tactful account of his attitude towards the marriage of his daughter Clara with Schumann.

The most interesting passages in the volume are perhaps those devoted to the author's autobiography, in the course of which she chats pleasantly about the many interesting people she has met. Among these were Schumann, Liszt, Henselt, Brahms, Joachim, Rossini, Rubinstein, Tausig, Wieniawski and Grieg. A number of interesting letters are published for the first time.

Richard Wagner: Sämtliche Schriften und Dichtungen. Volks-Ausgabe. Lieferungen 3 and 4.

[Breitkop & Härtel.]

To their popular edition of Wagner's prose and poetical writings Messrs. Breitkopf & Härtel have added two new half-volumes, that correspond with vol. ii. of the older editions. They contain the works of the 'forties, from 'Tannhäuser' to 'Siegfried's death,' and the 'Plan for the organization of a German national theatre for Saxony.' The volumes are well printed on a puce-coloured paper that does much to make the German type more tolerable to English eyes ; and they are extremely cheap at 6*d.* each.

Surge Illuminare. Motet for double chorus (unaccompanied). Composed by G. Pierluigi da Palestrina. Edited by G. R. Sinclair.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This superb specimen of the genius of Palestrina was one of the features of the programme at the recent Hereford Festival. It begins with a four-part fugal treatment of themes in the Hypodorian mode, which soon leads into a massive section in triple time in which there is an imposing eight-part climax. Some fine antiphonal effects from the two choirs ensue, and the first part concludes with a rich eight-part cadence ending in D major. Part II. changes the style ; the part-writing is broken, and the expression of a tender character. At the final section the music broadens out, and the rhythmic treatment has more strength. The two choirs alternate and overlap, and at the end unite in a gorgeous eight-part cadence. All large choirs in the country should add this dignified motet to their répertoire. It presents no technical difficulties, but simply demands fine tone and full sonority. Dr. Sinclair has fully marked the music for expression.

Cargoes. Part-song for mixed voices. By H. Balfour Gardiner. Novello's Part-Song Book, No. 1231.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

'Cargoes' is an excellent example of Mr. Balfour Gardiner's style. The poem by John Masefield is quaint, and it idealises matters of fact that a less skilful writer would have scarcely dared to utilise for poetic expression. It deals with the cargo of a 'Quinquireme of Nineveh' :

> 'Rowing home from haven in sunny Palestine,
> With a cargo of ivory and apes and peacocks,
> Sandal-wood, cedar-wood, and sweet white wine' and of a 'Stately Spanish galleon,' and contrasts these beautiful things with the cargo of a

> 'Dirty British coaster with a salt-caked smoke-stack,
> Butting through the Channel in the mad March days,
> With a cargo of Tyne coal, road-rails, pig-lead,
> Firewood, ironware, and cheap tin-trays.'

The composer's treatment of these words is ingenious and fanciful, and while the music is not difficult, it exhibits some strikingly original tonal and rhythmic features that should make the part-song popular. Especially we like the treatment of the 'Tyne coal' line and the effect of the short Molto allegro Coda.

Kinder Album. Vierundzwanzig kleine Präluden. For pianoforte. By Swan Hennessy. Op. 35.

[B. Schott's Söhne, Mainz.]

One seldom finds in works of small design such freedom from convention as that displayed by Mr. Swan Hennessy in these twenty-four preludes. With few exceptions the pieces spring from musical ideas of marked and exceptional character, which in varying degree are elucidated and justified by fancy titles. In his insistence upon individuality of conception, the composer often lights upon happy phrases and developments (as in 'Heute kommt der Lehrer nicht,' 'Erwartung,' 'Sonntags, and 'Der Sandmann kommt'), but at other moments the means are more striking than the end. It is often little more than clever posturing, which arouses curiosity rather than musical interest. The works are experimental miniatures, perhaps not intended to be taken seriously, and fit to be discussed as much as played. The workmanship is always careful, and there is more appeal to the mind of the musician than to that of the child. It is especially strange that a 'Kinder Album' should contain such forbidding time-signatures as $\frac{3}{4}$, $\frac{12}{16}$, and $\frac{9}{16}$-$\frac{6}{16}$. The first of these could easily be split up into threes and fours ; the second should have been $\frac{6}{8}$ with twice the number of bars ; the third, strange to say, is perfectly reasonable. It is true that the writer sets out to devise 'Taktarten,' but his notation does not always arise from the music.

Five songs of childhood. By E. Harold Davies. [Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Music attached to childish sentiments is often childish in the wrong sense. It is not uncommon to find a Barrie-like study of the child-mind afflicted with music fit for a nursery-rhyme. The verses chosen by Dr. Harold Davies for these 'songs of childhood' are of some individuality and this, we are glad to see, is more than matched in the music. It is fitting that a brother of Dr. Walford Davies should elevate his text. The family likeness can be traced further. These songs have the same unobtrusive distinction of melody, the same consistency and variety of accompaniment, the same unaffected avoidance of pretentiousness, banality, and sentimentality that would characterise a setting of the same words by the composer's brother. The titles of the songs—which are 'A sea-song from the shore,' 'Daisies,' 'The rainbow fairies,' 'Tree buds,' and 'Grasshopper green,'—indicate their contents. In technical character and range they are well fitted for the singing of any upper-class child with pretensions to vocalism. We confess to a special regard for 'The rainbow fairies,' a piece of dainty comedy.

William Vincent Wallace, a memoir by W. H. Grattan Flood.

[The Waterford News Offices, Waterford.]

This small neat booklet, which contains a portrait of the composer, amplifies the centenary article written by Dr. Grattan Flood in the Musical Times for July this year. The admirers of Wallace—they are fairly numerous—should be glad to possess this appreciative and well-written biographical sketch.

The Westminster Hymnal.—Dr. R. R. Terry, of Westminster Cathedral, writes to say that in our August number the reviewer of the Hymnal wrongly states that 'Adeste Fideles' is classed as a Plain-song melody. The mistake was owing to the tune appearing as the first of a set of 'Latin melodies,' most of which are Plain-song.

Mr. H. George Farmer desires to contradict an erroneous statement in his book 'The rise and development of Military Music.' Dr. Albert Hartman, he says, took his Mus. Doc. Degree at Dublin and not, as stated on page 134 of the book, at Oxford. Lieutenant Williams, M.V.O., bandmaster of H.M. Grenadier Guards, was the first bandmaster in the Service to take the degree of Mus. Doc. at Oxford.

Correspondence.

ON LISTENING TO MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

Sir,—While Mr. C. Egerton Lowe, in his article 'On Listening to Music: another point of view,' champions the case for the advancement of Musical Appreciation by technical instruction very well, he is not content with his 'other' point of view, but attempts also to mangle mine, believing, presumably, that his is the only point of view. I should like to add a few words, therefore, in defence of my original statement that the true beauty of music is to be appreciated without a knowledge of the technique that has gone to make it up, and that a nodding acquaintance with technique tends rather to diminish than to increase one's appreciation of the true beauty.

First, taking Mr. Egerton Lowe's statement, 'It may be that the author has not held any such classes himself, invited the opinions of teachers who have, or of students who have attended them; for had he done so he would surely have approached his subject from a different point of view': I admit that I have neither held such classes nor invited the opinions of teachers or students. On the other hand, the opinion put forward is not founded on complete ignorance, but on some study of listeners, and several years' training in musical technique. Also, I have made myself familiar with Mr. Macpherson's 'Music and its Appreciation'; so that, for instance, had I foreseen trouble, I could have arranged the words 'second subjects, recapitulations, developments, codas,' in their correct sequence without difficulty. Further, invited or uninvited, in Mr. Egerton Lowe's article we have a very strong statement of opinion of one who has had experience of Musical Appreciation Classes, and yet I remain unmoved!

The chief point of difference seems to be this: Mr. Egerton Lowe considers that 'the untrained hearer might be likened, in most cases, to a foreigner listening to the impassioned oration of a great speaker, of which he could only understand a few words here and there,' while I believe that music is a language common to everyone, and that the intensity of its appeal varies only with the natural and general receptivity of the listener.

Even allowing for the reserve in the words 'in most cases,' can one possibly reconcile the popularity of such music as the 'Tannhäuser' Overture, the 'Ride of the Valkyries,' or the battle movement of the 'Pathetic Symphony,' with Mr. Lowe's point of view? Is it in any sense because the audience have the faintest notion of what is happening (technically) that these pieces bring down such applause when they are given? Surely not! It is the appeal made by the sheer exuberance of the sound,—unreasonable, sensuous, if you will, but to my mind absolutely the real thing. For the expression to '"bask" in the sound in a merely passive state of sensuous gratification' must embrace such virile basking as this as well as the quieter sort, therefore I am prepared to say that there is no harm in basking, but, in fact, that it is what one is meant to do, for music only secondarily appeals to the intellect. Primarily, it satisfies an appetite—an appetite that craves for hard things to chew, like Bach, as well as bon-bons to suck, like Debussy; and, because it is a spiritual appetite, music is swept altogether off the plane of sensuality and the analogy is in no way derogatory to the art.

Mr. Egerton Lowe considers my wish to plunge the listener 'straight away into musical depths where the reason must drown and only the fancy float!' (the exclamation mark is his) 'the most amazing educational maxim ever perpetrated.'

Now, first, it was not meant as educational. The whole intention of my article was to diminish the importance of external education and to advocate the freer play of the imagination as a stimulus to musical appreciation—self-education, if you will. Not only in music but in all branches of training so-called education sometimes becomes merely interference with the natural development of personality.

Secondly, my statement was not made wildly. Mr. Egerton Lowe instances Elgar's first Symphony as music which it would be impossible fully to appreciate without some analysis, score, or explanation. It so happens that this very work, to my knowledge, has made the very deepest impression at a first hearing on many quite musically ignorant and untrained people—has yielded, in fact, the maximum amount of beauty that a thing of these proportions could yield upon a single performance. And these people would yawn if one approached them with explanations, for the very good reason that to them none is needed. The really important form that the A-flat Symphony complies with is a great dramatic sequence of emotions, and this can be realised simply by listening to the intensely expressive sounds.

Take again Strauss's operas 'Salome' and 'Elektra.' Does the colossal influence of the music of these depend in the least upon the extent to which they are understood? Quite the reverse. It is only necessary to listen to one of them at the opera house and afterwards to examine the pianoforte score to exchange the first comparatively simple impression for a perfect maze of complex ones. It is quite possible for intricate music to produce a simple effect—it is one of the proofs of greatness that it does so; and if the listener destroys this sense of unity by going behind the scenes to see how it is done, he loses more than he gains. Reluctantly I admit that Mr. Egerton Lowe has persuaded me of one thing. There are some who do not possess the germ of that imaginativeness which I want. Such are of little use as listeners under any circumstances, and any amount of technical instruction would at best make musical mechanics of them, fitted out with an inflexible taste in no sense their own.

As for the lady who took the second movement of the Beethoven Symphony for an Elgar Dance, the mistake was, of course, for her to have a programme in her hand at all!

Lastly, as one dealing constantly with musical technique for constructive purposes, may I add that I regard it as a necessity, but a nuisance, and it is only when I have succeeded in forgetting about workmanship and assume an 'unintelligent' attitude that I am able to make fair criticism of my own work.—Yours faithfully,

Hugh Priestley-Smith.

VINCENT WALLACE'S CENTENARY.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

Sir,—Could any of your readers kindly tell me if a complete set of band-parts of Vincent Wallace's opera 'Maritana' can be hired, as I hear from good authority it is very difficult to get parts that have not been greatly cut about. We are doing the opera in November next, exactly as printed in the vocal score, so I should be most glad to hear as soon as possible of a good set of parts that could be easily read and understood by the orchestra.—Yours truly, Conductor of the Leamington Madrigal Society. E. Roberts-West.

Obituary.

We regret to report the following deaths :—

Mr. Leopold Frederick Collin, at Windsor, Victoria. Born at Cassel, Leipsic, in 1832, Mr. Collin studied the pianoforte and obtained a considerable reputation. The gold-mining boom attracted him to Australia, where he settled as a pianist and teacher. Having purchased a music and pianoforte warehouse and two music businesses, he worked up a commercial undertaking that is now known throughout Australia.

On August 20, at Harlesden (after a long illness), William Henry Lee Davies, aged fifty-eight, last surviving son of W. H. Davies, originator of the Services of Song. Formerly organist at Holy Trinity Church, Beckenham, and the Collegiate Church, St. Mary's, Port Elizabeth, South Africa, Mr. Lee Davies was for many years conductor of the Philharmonic Society in Port Elizabeth.

Herr Heinrich Sontheim, at Stuttgart, aged ninety-two. Down to the 'seventies he enjoyed an immense reputation as an operatic tenor. His most famous rôle was that of Eleazar in Halévy's 'La Juive.'

The body of the late Rev. Charles Vincent Gorton, whose sad death by drowning we recorded in our September issue (p. 598), was recovered on September 1, eleven days after the accident. The deceased was fifty-eight years of age. He was buried in Breinton Churchyard, near Hereford.

AN OCTOGENARIAN MUSICIAN.

Madame Susanna Cole enters upon her Eighty-third Year.

On the fifteenth of this month (October) one of the best singers of the mid-Victorian era enters upon her eighty-third year in the person of Madame Susanna Cole, who was born at Tarrington, Herefordshire, on October 15, 1830. The daughter of the late Mr. James Cole—organist of the parish church there for nearly sixty years, and a member of the orchestra (violin) of the Three Choirs Festival for a similar period—Madame Cole was brought up in a musical atmosphere, and became acquainted with the works of the great masters at a very early age.

Acting on the advice of the late Mr. J. W. Davison, the then musical critic of The Times, who heard her sing at Hereford, Madame Cole came to London and placed herself under the care of Manuel Garcia. Making her début at Exeter Hall in 1849, the young vocalist at once sprang into public favour, and held a leading position for many years.

During Cardinal Wiseman's régime, when ladies were permitted to sing in the choirs of Roman Catholic churches, Madame Cole held several important appointments. She sang for many years at the church of the Jesuit Fathers, Farm Street, St. Patrick's, Soho, and the Royal Sardinian Chapel.

The last appointment held by Madame Cole in connection with Roman Catholic services was that of choirmistress at St. Raphael's, Surbiton, where Silas, the composer, officiated at the organ. Mr. Ben Davies, then a senior student at the Academy, frequently sang at this church.

In 1861 Madame Cole became associated with Jenny Lind in a performance of 'Elijah,' given at Exeter Hall in that year. The other artists whose names appeared on the programme were Miss Palmer, Miss Ives, Sims Reeves, Lewis Thomas, and Weiss. Dr. E. J. Hopkins presided at the organ, and Mr. Otto Goldschmidt conducted. Madame Cole is the sole survivor of this brilliant cast.

Madame Cole also sang at the opening of the new Cloth-workers' Hall, London, in 1861, the ceremony being performed by H.R.H. the late Prince Consort.

Becoming the wife of Mr. William Offord,—a tenor vocalist of repute, and editor of the Early English Musical Magazine—in 1870, Madame Cole formed an English opera company and toured, under her husband's management, through the United Kingdom and Ireland with considerable success, until illness compelled her to abandon the venture, and the company was broken up.

On the death of her husband in 1896, the Prime Minister (The Right Hon. A. J. Balfour) made Madame Cole a substantial grant from the Royal Bounty Fund.

During her professional career Madame Cole has been intimately associated with Balfe, Vincent Wallace, Jenny Lind, Alboni, Sims Reeves, Santley, Weiss, Benedict, Hallé, Sterndale Bennett, Costa, Macfarren, Sullivan, and other leading musicians of her day. Now at a ripe old age she is taking her otium cum dignitate under the shadow of the Alexandra Palace—at the opening of which she assisted in 1873—carrying with her in her retirement the good wishes of everyone with whom she has been associated, both in private life and during a long professional career.

FROM EISENACH TO LEIPSIC: A HOLIDAY TOUR.

Eisenach is beautifully situated 700 feet up in the Thuringian Forest. High above the town, looking down from the fir-clad hills, stands the Wartburg—an early medieval castle with which few can compare, a home of refuge to Luther, to Wagner a theme of song. According to tradition, Bach's birthplace is the house in the Frauenplan which now contains the Bach Museum. There are many interesting things to be seen here: original manuscripts, portraits, old prints, books, and a large collection of contemporary musical instruments. A fine statue of Bach, by Donndorf, stands in the market-place.

Arnstadt, in the highlands of Thuringia, is really the opening scene of Bach's career. Here, as a young man of eighteen, in the small New Church—now dedicated to St. Bonifacius—he pledged himself to 'all that might become an honourable servant and organist before God.' The church is now under restoration. In August, however, when my friend, Mr. C. A. Emery, and I visited it, little had as yet been done. The high-pitched roof, the tiers of wooden galleries, the organ-loft, and most of the interior decoration remained as they were at the beginning of the 18th century. In the Museum is shown the console of the organ on which Bach played. It has two manuals and twenty-five stops, with tremulant and two couplers. The compass of the pedals is two octaves from D: that of the manuals four octaves.

At Mühlhausen, where Bach stayed for only a year (1707-8), one feels more in touch with him than in many places where he lived much longer. The town, with its ancient buildings and old-world air, the handsome massive church, 'Dixi Blasii,' which seems to defy the touch of time, the organ with its unique blowing apparatus—all help the imagination. I cannot speak too warmly of the kindness of Herr Möller, the organist, who came out in the pouring rain to act as our guide. The Church of St. Blasius is a fine specimen of 14th-century architecture, with thick buttresses running all round the exterior, two beautiful spires on either side of the west façade, and a large apse at the east end. The inside of the church has been restored, and the organ-loft lowered. The chancel screen and the pointed altar-piece are old. The organ, which is much out of repair, is blown in the old method by four foot-levers, which have a drop of about six feet. They are worked by two men. A ladder stands by each couple of levers so that the blowers, having trodden down one lever each, may hastily climb up again and deal with the other two. Experience proved the exercise to be very exhausting.

At Weimar there is very little to recall the memory of Bach. He must indeed have played the organ in the town church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, where his friend Walther was organist, but the castle in which his own work lay was burned down towards the end of the 18th century. The modern grand ducal palace was built under the superintendence of Goethe. The town church has now a fine organ by E. F. Walcker & Co. The organist, Herr Hartung, very kindly came and played to us, choosing Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor and the Prelude and Fugue in G. He has a fine technique and plays with much feeling and, like many German organists, from memory.

In 1717 Bach went to Cöthen as Capellmeister at the small court of Prince Leopold of Anhalt-Cöthen. Here, during his six years' residence, he wrote most of his chamber music, including the well-known 'Forty-eight.' The castle, with its quiet courtyard, dates from the 16th century, and is still in good preservation. It is now used, part of it as a school, part of it as public offices—a change which has necessitated much internal alteration. The salon, now a large class-room, has not however lost its ancient grandeur. The beautiful ceiling and rich decoration still remain. Unfortunately, the musicians' gallery at the end of the room, which Bach must have known so well, has been walled up. The old chapel, which also has been turned into a class-room, is on the ground floor. The small organ, which Spitta believed to be the one used in Bach's day, has been removed within recent years.

St. Thomas Church, Leipsic, is hallowed by many associations. It has since 1496 been the centre of the town's religious life. Here Luther drew such crowds that the glass of a window was removed to enable his voice to reach a gallery erected outside. Here Bach was Cantor for twenty-seven years. Here in 1729 the 'St. Matthew' Passion was first performed. Since then the external aspect of the church has undergone little change. The western porch is new, the old St. Thomas School on the south side, in which Bach lived, has been pulled down; but the main fabric, with its conspicuous high-pitched roof, remains unchanged. Inside, however, the case is different. In the process of restoration many landmarks have disappeared. There used to be a second gallery above the present one, and also a small loft under the chancel arch from which some think the chorale in the first chorus of the 'St. Matthew' Passion was sung. Both have gone. The Bach traditions still flourish, fostered by Herr Professor Gustav Schreck, the latest link in the famous chain of Cantors. My thanks are due to him for much kindness. Under his able and inspiring direction, his choir, which also, as in Bach's time, does duty at the Church of St. Nicholas, well maintains its high reputation. The organ in St. Thomas Church, a large instrument of beautiful tone, stands in the spacious loft at the west end. Like most German organs it has a Rollschweller, or crescendo wheel, worked by the foot. Much and excellent use can be made of this contrivance. It is a pity that it is hardly ever found in English organs.

The organist, Herr Professor Straube, is one of the finest players in Germany. He is a brilliant executant, and his style is that of a great artist. I shall long remember the hour which I spent with him at the organ after morning service.

A. W. Wilson (Mus. Doc.),
Organist of Ely Cathedral.

LONDON'S MUNICIPAL ORCHESTRA.

The season of music in the many Parks and Open Spaces controlled by the London County Council has just ended. This season—which is, alas! all too short—has been a very successful one, insomuch as the bands engaged have all been excellent and the programmes of music presented showed a marked improvement in style, thus revealing the fact that the taste of the Londoner who goes to the various 'lungs' of the Metropolis is becoming surely, albeit slowly, more artistic and classical. This improvement is not so marked in the military-band programmes as it is in the programmes brought forward by the 'C' (orchestral) section of the London County Council own Parks' Band, although the military bands have played a great number of arrangements of most classical pieces; but in many of these the arranger has so hopelessly mutilated the original that it is almost impossible to recognise it, and more harm than good is done by its performance.

The Orchestra has this year been enlarged, and now consists of two flutes (interchangeable with piccolo), two oboes (one 'cor anglais' when necessary), two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, one tuba, timpani, bass-drum, &c. (two men), eight first violins, five second violins, three violas, four violoncellos, three basses, and a harp when required. It will be seen that the band is a useful one, and can play most of the music that is suitable for outdoor performance; but it would be much improved if there were another flute, a bass-clarinet, a double-bassoon, and another man at the drums, for then it would be possible to do much more modern music.

This Orchestra, which has been in existence for some half-a-dozen years, is conducted by Mr. John Mackinnon, who has controlled the band since its inception. He is a very talented musician, extremely broad-minded, and a most admirable conductor. He is popular with the men under him, and finds great favour with the public who listen to the Orchestra. The ensemble of the organization is really beautiful, and when one considers the many difficulties that have to be surmounted, particularly in the seating of the band upon antiquated bandstands that are far too small, Mr. Mackinnon deserves to be heartily congratulated upon the results he achieves.

The programmes of music p ayed by the Orchestra during the past season are worthy of much attention. They number fifteen, of twelve items each, and comprise 149 separate pieces, which is not at all a bad répertoire for what is truly a 'scratch' orchestra (used without disrespect). Each programme, generally speaking, consists of: Part I.: A march, an overture, a waltz, a light piece (if the symphony is long this is omitted), a symphony (taking up two or three numbers according to length); interval of fifteen minutes. Part II.: An overture, a light piece, a selection, a dance, a selection, and a march to finish.

The programmes are drawn up by Mr. Carl Armbruster, musical adviser to the London County Council, who is a brilliant musician, possessing rare and valuable artistic talent, and he does his work honourably. It is to him that we Londoners owe the high status of the music played by the bands, and in him the London County Council have a trustworthy officer who does everything thoroughly well.

Let us analyse the programmes, and begin by taking the symphonies first, of which there were fifteen performed, as follows:

Three by Raff:	'In the Forest.'
	'Lenore.'
	'Sounds of Spring.'
Two by Beethoven:	No. 2, in D.
	No. 6, in F. 'Pastoral.'
Two by Schubert:	No. 7, in C.
	'Unfinished,' in B minor.
Two by Mendelssohn:	'Italian,' in A.
	'Scotch,' in A minor.
Two by Tchaikovsky:	No. 5, in E minor and major.
	No. 6, in B minor, 'Pathétique.'
One by Schumann:	No. 3, in E flat, 'The Rhenish.'
One by Dvorák:	No. 5, in E minor, 'From the New World.'
One by Mozart:	No. 4, in D major.
One by Goldmark:	'A rustic wedding.'

This imposing list includes some fine examples of practically every school of music, and it is curious to note that Joachim Raff was drawn upon for no less than three symphonies, although his music, with the notable exception of the 'Cavatina,' is seldom heard in our concert-rooms. An explanation of this is difficult, and one can only say that his music is extraordinarily popular with the patrons of the London County Council concerts. More of Beethoven's symphonies would be very welcome, and surely the season cannot be far off when at least eight of the 'immortal nine' will be included in the répertoire of this progressive Orchestra. Very welcome is the inclusion of the mighty Schubert No. 7 in C, so foolishly labelled by some of our leading conductors as 'ultra-classical'; let them hear the enthusiastic applause of the 'ordinary' people when this London County Council Orchestra plays it, and they will perhaps alter their opinion, and bring out of the lumber-room one of the most noble works ever penned by any composer. Much more could be written in connection with these symphonies, but suffice it to say that they are one and all heartily received by the attentive crowds who listen to them.

Now we come to the overtures, and find they make a distinguished list: Four by Mendelssohn, two by Beethoven, two by Cherubini, and one each by Brahms, Wagner, Humperdinck, Smetana, Berlioz, Nicolai, Auber, Spohr, Mozart, Ambroise Thomas, Schubert, Weber, Sullivan, Sterndale Bennett, MacCunn, Mackenzie, Stanford, Landon Ronald, and Elgar.

Eight of these works it will be noticed are by British composers, Sullivan being represented by 'Di Ballo' and 'In Memoriam'; Sterndale Bennett by 'May Queen'; Hamish MacCunn by 'Land of the mountain and the flood'; Landon Ronald by 'A birthday'; Mackenzie by 'Britannia'; Stanford by 'Shamus O'Brien'; and Elgar by 'Cockaigne.' The Elgar overture is hardly suited to the Orchestra, and so intricately is it scored that many of its beauties are entirely lost when performed in the open air, consequently it has not become so popular as it deserves.

So much for the overtures, the list of which is dazzling in its variety.

Next to be referred to are what may be termed 'special pieces,' and the following list makes interesting reading:

Liszt:	'Tasso.'
Liszt:	Tarantella and Neapolitan song from 'Venezia e Napoli.'
Grieg:	'Peer Gynt' Suites Nos. 1 and 2.
Berlioz:	Love scene, 'Romeo and Juliet.'
Smetana:	'Vltava,' Symphonic-poem.
Bizet:	'L'Arlesienne' Suite No. 1.
Wagner:	'Siegfried Idyll.'
Jarnefeldt:	Præludium.
W. H. Reed:	'Venetian Suite.'
Edward German:	'Welsh Rhapsody.'
Stanford:	'Irish Rhapsody.'

There is an abundance of good music here, and there are one or two items which deserve some comment. It was a good thought to include Grieg's second 'Peer Gynt' Suite, for it is interesting and does not deserve the neglect under which it suffers. Jarnefeldt's clever canon in the form of a prelude has, as might well be expected, 'caught on.' The 'Siegfried Idyll' of Wagner is too delicate a work to perform in the open air in London, as none of the band enclosures are as quiet as the garden of the Villa Wahnfried, wherein this exquisite piece was first performed.

Three other items from the set of programmes call for notice. In order to be up-to-date Richard Strauss's tame waltz from 'Der Rosenkavalier' was played. Mr. F. Siedel, the talented principal flautist of the Orchestra, performed Popp's well-known Concertstück for flute and orchestra. Mr. F. Stock, the most able and clever leader of the Orchestra, performed Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor for violin and orchestra with great success, and as this, the first work of its kind to be played in the parks of London, has taken on so well, it is to be hoped that the Beethoven and Tchaikovsky concertos will be included in next season's répertoire.

It requires a versatile conductor to undertake the direction of the music played by the Orchestra, and in Mr. Mackinnon the London County Council have found one perfectly fitted for this calling, and they have been very lucky in their choice.

London's municipal orchestra has during the past season given ninety-two performances—seventy-nine of three hours each and thirteen of one hour each. Performances of three hours each have been given in the Villiers Street section of the Victoria Embankment Gardens forty-nine times, in Clissold Park eight times, on Peckham Rye seven times, on Clapham Common six times, in Waterlow Park six times, in Finsbury Park four times, in Victoria Park four times, on Parliament Hill three times, and in Golder's Hill Park once. The thirteen performances of one hour each have been given in the Temple section of the Victoria Embankment Gardens on Tuesdays from 1 to 2 p.m., when special programmes, consisting of extracts from the season's répertoire, have been presented.

From the foregoing it will be seen that the Orchestra has done an enormous amount of work during the past three months, and it has given great pleasure to several thousands of people. To those who have followed the Orchestra round from place to place it honestly seems that Londoners, after all, are not so unmusical and inartistic as they are often dubbed or thought to be.

ENGLAND AS A MUSICAL COUNTRY.

This subject for a lecture given by Mr. Percy A. Scholes, at Oxford, on August 26, in connection with the Oxford University Summer Course for Foreign Students, aroused a certain degree of curiosity when first announced. To the credit of the lecturer and his audience, as well as to that of the country, the proof of what had been done in the past and is being done to-day was admitted to be full and complete, and Mr. Scholes had a magnificent reception by a large number of students representing nearly twenty different nationalities.

After referring to the natural special interest created by the title of the lecture, the lecturer said he hoped to convert them all from error to truth in this matter. Not merely should the present productiveness or non-productiveness be taken into account, but chiefly England's contribution to the progress of the art. Dealing mainly with the historical aspects, he said that England could claim a very large share in the invention of harmonic composition. At the beginning of the 13th century, when the rest of Europe was singing its plainsong in crude successions of fifths, fourths, and octaves, in this country there was the wonderful 'Sumer is i-cumen in,' a most complex piece of contrapuntal music. This was, however, an art-work 'born out of due time.' The conscious and reasoned application of contrapuntal methods was born in England at the beginning of the 15th century, with the work of John Dunstable. Music composed previous to this was quickly discarded. Without the work of Dunstable, that of Palestrina, Bach, Haydn, Beethoven, Wagner, Strauss—none of them Englishmen—would have been unthinkable.

In Elizabethan times, in the days of Shakespeare, England was unquestionably a musical country. His audience had just spent a month in England without a fine day. Were they, therefore, to go home and say,

'England is a rainy country'? If they had been in Oxford for the same month last year they would not have felt a drop of rain during the whole time, and if they returned next year they might enjoy similar good fortune. So also any country had its musical and unmusical periods.

The English reputation for music in the 17th century was illustrated by instances of English musicians, such as Bull and Dowland, whose services were greatly sought after. Dowland's works, in his own lifetime, were printed in Paris, Antwerp, Cologne, Nuremburg, Frankfurt, Hamburg, Leipsic, Heidelburg, and Amsterdam. Rubinstein began his historical recitals with the works of Byrd, whom he described as the inventor of artistic instrumental music. It might almost be said that Byrd invented the variation form—the earliest attempt at the provision of a form suitable for lengthy instrumental compositions.

A rapid sketch was then given of the position of music during the Commonwealth and later Stuart days, and some attention was devoted to the work of Purcell.

The statement that 'the composer whom you call Haendel and we call Handel' was 'another great Englishman' provoked laughter. Mr. Scholes pointed out, however, that Handel was so anxious to be called an Englishman that he had a special Act of Parliament passed for the purpose, and in it clearly gave his name as 'Handel,' not 'Haendel.' He changed his name and nationality, and if he were by birth a Saxon and by training partly an Italian, we must never forget that the influence of Purcell is plainly seen in his choral writing.

After a brief sketch of the development of English music in the 18th and 19th centuries, the lecture concluded with a rapid statement of the position of affairs to-day, and especially of the 'Appreciation' movement in musical education, and the Englishman's heritage of folk-song—a heritage of which he had only just become aware.

Musical illustrations were given by the lecturer and by Mrs. Scholes.

HOME MUSIC STUDY UNION.

'The Musicians' Holiday.'

The fifth annual Musicians' Holiday of the Home Music Study Union was held at Edgehill College, Bideford, from August 10 to 24, and proved to be one of the most successful of the series. About one hundred members of the Union attended, the proportions of amateur and professional being almost equal. Several excursions were undertaken, but the inclement weather made the lectures and indoor entertainments the chief items. The lectures covered a very wide range of subjects, and led to animated and interesting discussions. Mons. M.-D. Calvocoressi gave three lectures, —on 'Modern French Music,' 'Modern Russian Music,' and 'Franz Liszt,' the last-named subject giving him an opportunity of placing before his audience a remarkably clear and comprehensive definition of programme music. Other lectures were by Mr. Stewart Macpherson on 'Musical Appreciation Study—a coming force'; Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser on 'Songs of the Hebrides' and 'The Matthay pianoforte tone-production'; Mr. G. C. Ashton Jonson on 'Nationality in Art, illustrated in the works of Grieg and MacDowell,' 'The development of the Tone-poem,' and 'The use of Leitmotiven in melodrama, as shown in Richard Strauss's music to "Enoch Arden"'; Mrs. Milligan Fox on 'The Irish Bards'; and Mr. Percy Scholes on 'Bideford men and music in the days of "Westward Ho!"' Illustrations were given by the lecturers and various members of the party, including Miss Margaret Kennedy, Mrs. Scholes, Miss Ethel Hamlin, and Messrs. Montagu-Nathan and Montague Borwell.

Of the entertainments some of the most interesting were a composers' concert and a series of Irish and other plays given under the direction of Miss Dorothy Clarendon. The former included excellent songs by Dr. E. J. Bellerby and Mrs. Milligan Fox, two movements from a very promising Pianoforte sonata by Miss Hamlin, and many other items of varying interest.

During the holiday the annual meeting of the Home Music Study Union was held, at which various reports were received and the officers re-elected. Dr. W. H. Hadow is the President of the Union, and the general-secretary is Mr. J. E. Lawrence, 52, Francis Street, Leeds.

Besides these pre-arranged matters, many informal discussions on methods of teaching and performance were held, and several recitals of vocal and instrumental works were given by Messrs. Borwell and Ashton Jonson, the latter obtaining very artistic results from the use of the 'Themodist' piano-player.

THE COMING SEASON IN LONDON.*

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The clever frivolities of Maurice Ravel's 'Mother Goose' Suite, of which four numbers were played on August 27, are one of the brightest memories of this season's 'Promenades.' If Strauss is the Mephistopheles of modern music, Ravel is the Puck. The little fairy adventures of the Mother Goose story are told, for the greater part, in a mood of open mirth, and even in the more tender sentences one is conscious of a suppressed giggle. Mackenzie's attractive 'Scottish' Pianoforte concerto followed, finely played by Mr. Arthur Cooke. On the following night the same composer's 'Twelfth Night' Overture, a valuable legacy from the 'Shakespeare Concerts,' was performed as part of an interesting programme.

The 'Vorspiel and Serenade' from Erich Korngold's 'Der Schneemann,' which was given on August 29, is the most genuinely pleasing work by this youth that has been heard in London. In the Pianoforte sonata, played last season by Herr Buhlig, the composer gives wing to an amazing technique and exuberant imagination; but, on the whole, protests too much. Here, however, all is quiet mastery, an interesting flow of placid melody, neatly and thoughtfully harmonized, all its phrases consistent, appropriate, and well-rounded. The excerpt is unpretentious and small—it was over by the time the audience had settled down to enjoy it—but it was eloquent of musicianship and promise.

Arnold Schönberg's 'Five Orchestral Pieces,' played for the first time on September 3, were described on the programme as 'experiments in dissonance.' Such they assuredly were; and while nobody could reasonably claim that he had not been fairly warned, almost everybody present seemed bewildered, if not shocked, at the degree to which Schönberg had carried his protest against all preconceived notions of music and harmony. It was understood that the writer's aim was to express certain aspects of his own emotional life in that sort of 'futurist' musical impressionism which has fascinated one who is a futurist painter as well as a daring composer. Unhappily, the listener had no definite guide to the particular emotion underlying the composition. Therefore it sounded vague and disconnected, while most of the matter presented was ugly enough to suggest nothing but the distracting fancies of delirium. Schönberg's day has not dawned yet, and apparently 'promenaders' are not in a hurry for it. The work began by provoking laughter, but this soon gave way to weariness.

Very different and far more satisfactory was the next novelty of the week, given on September 5. This was a group of 'Music Pictures,' in which Mr. J. H. Foulds has reduced to terms of music the impression he has received from four suggestive but widely-contrasted pictures. The sections based on Blake's 'Ancient of Days' and Boutigny's 'Tocsin' are rather laboured, the first being somewhat stolid and the second a trifle obvious. But Mr. Foulds rises higher in his translations into sound of Martin's 'Old Greek Legend' and Brunet's 'Columbine.' It was not, perhaps, a stroke of genius to employ the Phrygian mode in the former, or to use quarter-tones very freely in the latter for the sake of doing justice to Boutigny's subtle colour scheme. Mr. Foulds, however, does not rely only on such comparatively transparent devices. His 'Columbine,' in particular, is a really charming piece of work, clever, atmospheric, and engaging.

Glazounoff's 'Introduction and Dance of Salome' (Op. 90), which was performed for the first time in England on September 10, gave us nothing new in psychology, but pleased the ear with its high-sounding, passionate writing and rich and brilliant scoring. On the following evening a 'Hungarian Overture' by Mr. F. Korbay was given its first performance. National characteristics were not strongly marked, the music being more European than Hungarian. It told however an eloquent tale, to which the composer's mastery of the orchestra gave additional point.

Mr. A. M. Hale's 'Elegy' in C sharp minor for organ, strings, and drums, performed for the first time on September 12, was marked by a somewhat over-sentimental use of the organ, and ideas that were promising but not skilfully handled. However, the work was well received. The Entr'acte from Korngold's 'Snowman,' which was given on the same night, proved as fresh and fascinating as the two excerpts from the same work described above.

On September 17 music written by Sir Edward Elgar for the masque 'The Crown of India' at the Coliseum was performed as a concert-piece. The impression of vigorous writing and picturesque scoring that was made some time ago by the first performance of Coleridge-Taylor's Rhapsodic Dance 'The Bamboula,' was renewed on September 18.

The 'Intermezzi Goldoniani' for string orchestra by Enrico Bossi, that were played on September 19, provided a genuine surprise. There was nothing in our previous knowledge of the composer's works to suggest such subtlety of thought and means. The design and much of the thematic material of the six numbers that form the Suite spring from the music of Goldoni's period. The harmonization is of considerable freedom, but is ruled by appropriateness to the forms and melodies by which the antique is suggested. Here the connection with the past ends, and there is abundant modern finesse in the phrase-building, the development, and the scoring.

HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

In spite of opposition from ecclesiastical quarters, financial forebodings, criticisms of the programmes, and chilling doubts expressed as to the need for the continued existence of the event, the 189th Three Choirs meeting was very successfully held at Hereford on September 8 to 13. We do not feel called upon here to enter into the question as to the propriety of giving concerts in the Cathedral, and as to the musical value of the Festival we think that the fact that the event undoubtedly serves the musical needs of a large number of people in the district is in itself a justification of its continuance. The programmes of these Festivals may not be specially devised to attract musicians from a distance, but at least they serve to familiarise audiences of amateurs with acknowledged masterpieces of the art presented by competent performers, and they have always, so far as we can remember, given native composers an opportunity of being heard.

The music presented at the services held in the Cathedral during the Festival period is always a feature of special interest on these occasions. The most important of these services was held on Sunday afternoon (September 8), when the full Festival choir and orchestra took part and the Archdeacon of Cirencester preached an admirable sermon from the text 'But now bring me a minstrel' (2 Kings iii., 15). The following music was performed:

Slow movement from Symphony in E flat .. .. Mozart
Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in G .. C. V. Stanford
(Solos by Hereford Cathedral choristers and Mr. Allister Proctor.)
Anthem—150th Psalm—
'Hallelujah, O praise ye the Lord' César Franck
Coronation March .. .. Edward Elgar
Anthem, 'Hallelujah' ('Engedi') .. .. .. Beethoven
First movement from Sonata No. 11 .. .. Rheinberger
(Mr. Percy C. Hull was at the organ.)

At the other services, including Matins on Sunday, held during the week the following music was used:

Te Deum and Benedictus ... ... Garrett in E.

SERVICES.

Harwood in A flat.
Stainer in E flat.
Brewer in E flat.
Garrett in F.
Smart in B flat.

ANTHEMS.

O Lord, increase my faith ... ... Gibbons.
Jesu, the very thought is sweet ... ... Vittorio.
The wilderness... ... ... S. S. Wesley.
Abide with me ... ... Ivor Atkins.
Great is the Lord ... ... Ouseley.
If the Lord Himself ... ... Walmisley.

The choir was entirely supplied by the Hereford, Gloucester, and Worcester Festival Societies, which include the three Cathedral choirs. It consisted of 70 sopranos (ladies), 24 trebles (boy choristers), 49 contraltos (ladies), and 12 male altos, 52 tenors, and 56 basses. Total 263. The orchestra of eighty-four performers was composed mainly of members of the London Symphony Orchestra, led by Mr. W. H. Reed. Mr. G. Holloway was orchestral superintendent, and Messrs. Novello & Co. were the librarians. Dr. G. R. Sinclair, the organist of Hereford Cathedral, was the general conductor. Mr. Ivor Atkins (Worcester) and Dr. A. Herbert Brewer (Gloucester) presided respectively at the organ at the morning and evening performances. The temporary festival organ was built by Messrs. Nicholson & Co., of Worcester.

Monday, September 9, was devoted to rehearsals; and on Tuesday morning and afternoon 'Elijah' was performed before a large audience. This familiar work served to display the fine quality of the voices. The sopranos, aided by the skilfully-trained boys, were brilliant, and the general sonority was excellent. There were no attempts at record effects, if we pass over some small exaggerations of dynamic relations. Interest in the solos centred in the appearance of Miss Ruth Vincent, a comparative new-comer in oratorio circles, whose beautiful voice and attractive style at once enlisted the sympathy and approval of the auditors. The other principal singers were Madame Ada Crossley, Mr. Gervase Elwes (whose singing of 'If with all your hearts' was something to remember), and Mr. Thorpe Bates. The part of the Youth was admirably sung by Master B. A. Watt, a Hereford chorister.

At the evening concert on September 9, Miss Muriel Foster sang the solo cantata, 'O amantissime sponse Jesu' (Christian Ritter), and the solo in Brahms's 'Rhapsodie' for alto voice and male choir. Both interpretations were remarkable, and induced a feeling of deep satisfaction that so fine an artist had returned, even to a limited extent, to public life. The immortal 'Requiem' by Brahms was also given in this programme. The performance was a good one, although it revealed no special study or preparation. Miss Ada Forrest and Mr. Thorpe Bates were the soloists. Both sang well, but it may be said that they have yet to discover some of the deepest expression of this great work. The last item was Beethoven's C minor Symphony.

On Wednesday morning and afternoon (September 11) the 'St. Matthew' Passion of Bach was given. The version used was that recently published by Messrs. Novello & Co., under the joint-editorship of Sir Edward Elgar and Mr. Ivor Atkins. By general consent the performance on this occasion was considered exceptionally fine. It had the great advantage of utilising practically the same resources as were employed at Worcester last year, and the increased familiarity with the music led naturally to freedom and fluency in the execution. The soloists were Miss Edith Evans, Miss Marie Houghton, Miss Muriel Foster, Miss Sara Silvers, Mr. Gervase Elwes, Mr. Roland Jackson, Mr. Campbell McInnes, Mr. Allister Proctor, and Mr. Robert Radford. Mr. Elwes greatly distinguished himself in the part of the Evangelist, and Mr. Campbell McInnes displayed deep feeling in the part of Christ. The aria, 'Have mercy, Lord,' was perfectly sung by Miss Foster, and the beautiful violin obbligato was finely played by Miss Evangeline Anthony. Mr. Radford, too, was at his best. A word is due to the players of the orchestral obbligati instruments for their artistic performance. On the whole, the greatness and sublimity of the work were notably revealed. Dr. Sinclair, who conducted, deserves special recognition for his part in achieving this result.

Before each part of the Passion music a Chorale from the work, arranged for brass instruments by Sir Edward Elgar, was played. No. 35, 'The Christian soul bewails the frailty of mankind,' was played from the Cathedral tower before the morning performance, and No. 63, 'O Sacred Head surrounded,' from the north porch before the afternoon resumption. These proceedings interested a large number of townsfolk who were unable to attend the performance of the work.

The evening concert on Wednesday was given in the Shire Hall, an arena much too small for the purpose of performance by a modern full orchestra.

The programme was as follows:

Overture .. 'Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg' .. Wagner
Sarastro's Invocation, 'Possenti, numi' ('Il Flauto Magico') Mozart
Osmin's Aria, 'Ah, che voglio Trionfare!' ('Il Seraglio') Mozart
Mr. Robert Radford.
Serenade for String Orchestra .. .. Granville Bantock
(First time of performance. Conducted by the Composer.)
Songs .. .. (a) 'The Torch' (b) 'The River' .. Edward Elgar
(First performance with Orchestra. Conducted by the Composer.)
Miss Muriel Foster.
Pianoforte Concerto in A Minor, Op. 54 .. Schumann
Mr. Leonard Borwick.
Aria .. .. 'Dove Sono' ('Figaro') .. .. Mozart
Miss Ruth Vincent.
New Suite (for Orchestra) 'The Crown of India' Edward Elgar
(First Concert Performance. Conducted by the Composer.)
1. Dance of Nautch Girls. 3. Warriors' Dance.
2. Minuet. 4. Interlude.
5. March of the Mogul Emperor.

Mr. Robert Radford's full, rich voice and artistry told effectively in his two songs, and the orchestration invested Sir Edward Elgar's songs with a new and great interest. They were splendidly performed by Miss Foster, whose significant and intensely expressive utterance of the name of the personified river 'Rustula' was stirring.

Mr. Bantock's Suite, although performed for the first time, is, we believe, not quite new—it is amazing to find how much completed music this fertile composer hides up his capacious sleeve! It was a welcome item because of its clarity, brightness, and piquancy. Mr. Bantock, although quite capable of composing tunes of his own, has a penchant in the direction of immortalizing well-known popular airs. In the present instance he has used the beautiful air 'The Swanee River' and the less distinguished (from the musical standpoint) 'Yankee Doodle.' The Schumann Concerto was played by Mr. Borwick with more elegance than virility. No doubt it was difficult to tone down the orchestra in this small, resonant hall, but there was not enough effort made in this direction. There is a promise of new life for Elgar's 'Crown of India' music in the form of an orchestral suite. The elegance and grace of the earlier movements and the magnificent barbaric turmoil of the last movement will surely tell as the music becomes familiar and when it is performed in a fit arena. The violin solo in the interlude was charmingly played by Mr. W. H. Reed. Miss Vincent again exhibited the liquid beauty of her voice in 'Dove Sono'—which, by the way, is not the only soprano aria that Mozart composed.

An impressive performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius,' under the direction of the composer, on Thursday morning was one of the most memorable features of the Festival. All the executants were so completely familiar with the work that they were able to yield themselves freely to the interpretation of the composer. It is long since we have had the privilege of hearing Miss Muriel Foster in the Angel's part, and as she was joined by an equally consummate artist, Mr. Gervase Elwes, in the title-part, the combination was unique. Mr. Thorpe Bates took the bass parts, and if his interpretation did not reach the very high level attained by his fellow soloists, he was always safe and musicianly. The choruses were sung with fine tone, and the semi-choruses, although not dead in tune, had a duly ethereal character. The demons' chorus might have been more intensely and savagely declaimed without approaching an exaggerated realism that is worse than tameness. The final great setting of 'Praise to the Holiest' had some magnificent moments. The splendid sonority of the tone in the climaxes was enhanced by the acoustic properties of the Cathedral.

In the afternoon Sir Hubert Parry's new choral work, 'Ode on the Nativity of Christ,' was given, Miss Ada Forrest singing the soprano solo. As we referred fully to the work in our last issue, we need not now again describe its features in detail. The old words (by William Dunbar, c. 1460-1513) have strength, charm, and variety, and the moods are on the whole those of cheerfulness. The music has Parry's best characteristics, the choral sections especially being grateful to sing, and always displaying colour and contrapuntal interest. The work exhibits no new departure of style; one recognises the composer of 'Blest Pair of Sirens.' There is always mastery of the resources employed, and consequently the music flows freely. The soprano solo is more effective when it is truly a solo than when in climaxes it is concerted with the choir, in which it gets lost. The work was conducted by the composer.

The remainder of the afternoon was occupied by a performance of the Good Friday music ('Charfreitagszauber'), Act III., and the final Grail Scene, Act I., of Wagner's 'Parsifal.' In the latter extract a great effect was made by the chorister boys being concealed aloft, their voices gaining additional beauty from their remoteness. There were occasional indecisions in the rhythmic attack, but on the whole the performance was impressive.

At the evening performance in the Cathedral the novelty was the Fantasia on Christmas Carols, written for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra by Dr. Vaughan Williams. Like Mr. Bantock the composer finds musical cud to chew in old tunes. The carols selected are quaint in their modal idiom, and have an attractive swing which is accentuated by Dr. Williams's treatment. Mr. Campbell McInnes sang the solos with much feeling—occasionally importing for the purpose even too much of his strong temperament. The work we have no doubt will be found attractive at the appropriate season.

Another choral work of great interest which was presented on this occasion was Palestrina's eight-part motet, 'Surge, Illuminare,' a splendid example of its famous composer's skill in writing for voice. It was a welcome oasis of strictly choral music in the programme.

As Dr. Walford Davies was unable to complete his promised work, 'Song of offering,' Schubert's ever-welcome B minor Symphony was played—another 'unfinished' work, as Punch aptly remarked.

Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' ended the programme. It is not necessary here to dwell on its manifold beauties. The work wears well, and still fixes interest. The performance was a fair one, without displaying much virtuosity. The soloists were Miss Edith Evans, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. William Green, and Mr. Robert Radford.

'The Messiah' was given on the last day. Following precedent at the Three Choirs gatherings, the whole of the work was performed, there being an interval of an hour for luncheon. Mozart's additional accompaniments were used. The choir showed that it had stood the strain of the week without harm. No special readings were attempted. We had the great work just as we have almost always had it at festivals. Interest again centred upon Miss Ruth Vincent, who sang the soprano solos. It is a pleasure to record her success, which was attained not merely by the charm of her voice, but by a still greater charm of simplicity and ease of style. It is not often that we hear the 'Messiah' solos sung so truly in tune. The other soloists were Madame Crossley, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Robert Radford, all artists of the greatest experience in oratorio singing. The method of use of the band in the solos induced some reflections. The accompaniments sounded business-like and formal rather than sympathetic. It is a fashion that might well be abandoned for the band to break out with a massive forte in the interludes even of the Passion music. To our mind the impression built up by the soloist in, say, 'He was despised' is rudely dispelled when the band bursts forth into an almost jubilant and unexpressive forte for no other reason apparently than that the soloist is not at that moment in the way.

The Festival was concluded by a Chamber Concert given on Friday evening in the Shire Hall. The programme was as follows:

String Quartet in E flat minor, Op. 30 .. .. Tchaikovsky
THE GRIMSON QUARTET.
First violin, Miss JESSIE GRIMSON.
Second violin, Mr. CHARLES WOODHOUSE.
Viola, Mr. ERNEST TOMLINSON.
Violoncello, Mr. EDWARD MASON.

Songs .. ('Der Knabe mit dem Wunderhorn' / 'Der Page' .. .. / 'Der Hidalgo' .. .. ..) Schumann
Mr. ROLAND JACKSON.

Pianoforte Solos (a) Impromptu, Op. 142, No. 1 .. Schubert; (b) Etude in A minor, Op. 25, No. 11 .. Chopin
Mr. LEONARD BORWICK.

Songs .. .. ('When lovers meet again' / 'My true love hath my heart') C. H. H. Parry
Miss MARIE HOUGHTON.

String Quartet .. 'Italian Serenade' .. Hugo Wolf
THE GRIMSON QUARTET.

Songs .. .. ('Sapphische Ode' .. .. .. Brahms; 'Der Schmied' .. .. .. Brahms; 'Mansfallensprüchlein' .. Hugo Wolf; 'Ein fröhlich's Gesang' Old German (1623))
Miss PHYLLIS LETT.

Quintet for pianoforte, two violins, viola and 'cello, César Franck
Mr. LEONARD BORWICK AND THE GRIMSON QUARTET.

It will be observed that in this case English chamber-music is conspicuous by its almost complete absence. But all the same, the programme was a fine one. We regret we were unable to stay to hear it.

SOUTH AFRICAN CHORAL FESTIVALS.

[By a Correspondent.]

There are probably few readers of the Musical Times who have not some friends in South Africa, and even many who have not will be glad to learn something of the state of choral music within the Union, and will be rejoiced to know that in spite of occasional set-backs the choral Societies and similar institutions are making excellent progress.

Under the management of Dr. Barrow Dowling, one of the most competent musicians at the Cape, the services of Miss Emily Breare, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Charles Knowles were enlisted for a concert tour in which these artists should co-operate with the chief choral Societies of the Union in a series of festival performances of familiar works.

The tour opened at Durban on July 8 with a performance of 'Hiawatha,' given in the presence of the Governor-General (Lord Gladstone) and a vast audience, by the Musical Association, under the direction of Mr. J. Frank Proudman. Two ballad-concerts were given in Durban, followed by similar concerts at Pietermaritzburg, Pretoria (two), and Johannesburg. At Kimberley the party assisted in a performance of 'Elijah' in which the choir, conducted by Mr. G. H. Ashworth (formerly of Leeds), displayed considerable intensity of dramatic feeling. Two concerts at Bloemfontein were followed by the Festival at East London, which opened on July 30 with selections from 'Judas Maccabæus' and a miscellaneous half. Mr. W. T. Chapman ably conducted, and the choir sang with great beauty of tone. After a halt at Grahamstown, which was about to celebrate its centenary, the journey was continued to Port Elizabeth, where 'Elijah' was performed, the choir and orchestra, under Mr. Edward Sangster's direction, numbering 250. On August 7 a miscellaneous concert was given, in which Mr. Sangster took part as violinist and Mr. Roger Ascham as pianist. A ballad concert on August 8 brought the Festival to a conclusion amid great enthusiasm.

With a choir and orchestra of some 250 performers, Cape Town Festival commenced on August 13 with a concert by the party, with Mr. Ellie Marx as violinist, Mr. G. Denholm Walker as organist, and Dr. and Mrs. Barrow Dowling as accompanists.

The works performed were 'The Golden Legend' (August 14), 'Hiawatha' (August 16), and 'The Wedding of Shon Maclean' (August 17). Dr. Dowling had secured the co-operation of Mr. W. H. Bell, the principal of the Cape Town School of Music, who conducted several orchestral numbers with marked skill.

It was decided on the last day of the Festival to give a special performance of 'Elijah' at popular prices as a mark of esteem to Dr. and Mrs. Dowling, whose strenuous labours during the last twenty years in Cape Town have contributed so largely to the high musical culture in this city.

During the last three or four years Dr. Dowling, in addition to training and conducting the choir and orchestra, has borne heavy financial responsibilities. But it is thought that Cape Town will now rise to the occasion and relieve him of this burden by forming a guarantee fund or by means of subscriptions.

There is everything to hand—a splendid choir and an excellent body of strings; the weak spot is the wood-wind. But in places like Cape Town this difficulty may be bridged over by the services of men from the regimental bands stationed here.

Here it must be pointed out to the powers-that-be, and the advocates of high military pitch, that whenever these men join an orchestra, British choirs and principals are condemned to sing half a note higher than was intended by composers, all because it would cost a few thousand pounds to bring the regimental bands into line with modern demands. Some voices are unaffected by the strain of high pitch, but others are ruined.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

Irrespective of the Triennial Musical Festival, designed to open on October 1 with the customary inaugural performance of 'Elijah,' the local musical season promises to be one of the busiest on record, and there are likely to be more really important concerts than ever. Choral music will form a conspicuous feature, but provision has also been made for purely orchestral concerts, although their number will be somewhat restricted. Of more than ordinary interest will be the large number of concerts to be given under the management of the various local music-dealers, on which occasions will be heard the greatest artists associated with the musical life of London. The following forecast of the approaching musical season will therefore not be out of place in the columns of the Musical Times.

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society will give, as usual, four choral concerts in addition to the annual Yuletide performance of the 'Messiah,' for the latter of which they have secured as principals Madame Mary Conly, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. J. Stenart Wilson, and Mr. Hamilton Harris. Their season will open on November 7 with Berlioz's 'Faust' (principals, Miss Edith Evans, Mr. Frank Mullings, Mr. James Coleman, and Mr. Thorpe Bates). On December 5 will be performed Parry's 'Pied piper of Hamelin,' Dr. Walford Davies's new Festival work, 'Song of St. Francis,' and Mr. Arthur Cooke's new work, 'The fountain of tears' (principals, Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Miss Gertrude Lonsdale, Mr. Morgan Kingston, Mr. Watkin Mills). On February 20 the programme will include Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio' (Parts 1 and 2) and Mozart's 'Requiem' (principals, Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Robert Radford). April 10 will be reserved for a grand Wagner selection, comprising excerpts from 'Tristan und Isolde,' 'Rienzi,' 'Lohengrin' and 'Meistersinger' (principals, Miss Agnes Nicholls, Mr. Walter Hyde, and Mr. Frederic Austin).

The Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association are producing nothing new, but their programme is an attractive and popular one, and will consist of performances of Haydn's 'Creation' (November 16); Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' and Anderton's 'Yule Tide' (December 21); Elgar's 'King Olaf' and a miscellaneous selection (February 22); Mascagni's 'Cavalleria Rusticana' and miscellaneous selection (April 5).

The Midland Musical Society open their season on October 12 with the 'Messiah.' On November 23 Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-Bon' Suite will be given, to be followed by Bach's cantata 'Sleepers, wake,' and Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens.' Dvorák's 'Spectre's Bride' and a copious Wagner selection will be given on February 8. On March 21 the Society will perform Brahms's 'Requiem,' 'Song of Destiny,' and 'Alto Rhapsody.'

The Birmingham Choral Union also rely on standard works to draw popular audiences. Their concerts will be given on November 9, December 4, January 25, and March 1, and the works to be submitted are 'Elijah,' Gounod's 'Faust,' Mozart's 12th Mass, and German's 'Merrie England.'

Orchestral music will chiefly rest with the Birmingham Philharmonic Society and the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra. The former, however, will only give four concerts instead of seven or eight, again reverting to the plan adopted two years ago of engaging a different conductor for each concert, those who have accepted the post being Messrs. Wassili Safonoff, Thomas Beecham, Landon Ronald, and Michael Balling. The Birmingham Symphony Orchestra will, as hitherto, give four Saturday popular orchestral concerts, and in addition to these a special mid-week concert. Among the principal artists engaged will be Madame Blanche Marchesi and Monsieur André de Ribeaupierre, the accomplished violinist. Mr. Julian Clifford, of the Harrogate Kursaal Orchestra, will be the conductor.

Of special interest will be Messrs. Dale & Forty's six chamber concerts, for which the Arthur Catterall String Quartett and the Miller Johnstone Madrigal Choir have been engaged. The same concert-givers have also arranged for a special concert on November 11, at which Madame Melba, Herr Backhaus, Mr. Edmund Burke, and Zigeti will be heard. The Gramophone Company are also giving a concert on October 22, when the executants will be the New Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Landon Ronald, Miss Irene Scharrer (solo pianist), and Mr. Evan Williams (vocalist). The four Harrison Concerts will form a greater attraction this season than ever, and will be inaugurated by a pianoforte recital to be given by M. Paderewski. The fine list of artists engaged for the series will include Madame Donalda, Madame Ada Crossley, Miss Maggie Teyte, and Madame Ackté (vocalists), Señor Pablo Casals (violoncello), Herr Fritz Kreisler (violin), and Herr Backhaus (pianoforte). The last concert will be an orchestral one, for which the Queen's Hall Orchestra and Sir Henry J. Wood have been specially secured. Messrs. Priestley, who are managing several local musical events, have also arranged for a concert to be given by Monsieur Jacques Thibaud (violin), Señor Pablo Casals (violoncello), and Mr. Harold Bauer (pianoforte). The Max Mossel Drawing-room Concerts, which are four in number, promise to be of special attraction, the artists engaged being Madame Julia Culp, Sigismund Feuerman, the boy violinist, the Rosé Quartet, Miss Florence Smith (pianoforte), Herr Siloti, the famous Russian pianist, and Madame Tilly Koenen, the Dutch vocalist. Grand opera will be presented by the Quinlan Opera Company, who will give a fortnight's operatic season at the Theatre Royal, commencing on November 18. The repertory will be augmented by performances of 'Louise,' 'The Marriage of Figaro,' 'Lohengrin,' and 'La Bohème.' The Carl Rosa Opera Company pay a visit to Birmingham early in December to the Prince of Wales Theatre, but a detailed scheme of the works to be performed is not yet available.

BRISTOL.

Four of the local choral Societies have made known their arrangements for the coming season.

Bristol New Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Mr. Arnold Barter, will rehearse 'The Music Makers' (Elgar), 'John Gilpin' (Cowen), a selection from 'Samson' (Handel), 'Sea Wanderers' (Granville Bantock), and British folk-song music arranged by Percy Grainger.

West Bristol Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Charles Read, will perform 'Acis and Galatea' (Handel) and 'The Spectre's Bride' (Dvorák).

Clifton Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. A. Ernest Hill, have chosen 'Martha' (Flotow), 'Gethsemane to Golgotha' (Turner), and 'The Wreck of the Hesperus' (Anderton).

Bristol Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. C. W. Stear, will give 'The Ancient Mariner' (Barnett), and 'Messiah.'

Bristol Symphony Orchestra, conductors Messrs. F. S. Gardner, Maurice Alexander, and Herbert Parsons, will give Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony and symphonies by Brahms and Tchaikovsky.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

The Plymouth Orpheus Male-voice Choir with excellent enterprise entered the lists of the Welsh National Eisteddfod at Wrexham, and on September 6 won unqualified praise from Mr. Bantock for their infallible intonation. As a young body of only five years' growth and absolutely without competitive festival experience, they were by no means broken-spirited because they did not come within view of a prize.

The Guildhall Choir (conductor, Mr. H. Moreton, borough organist) have opened another session, taking in hand for rehearsal the 'Hiawatha' trilogy, 'The Messiah,' 'The Golden Legend,' and 'The Redemption.' It is stated, though arrangements are as yet non-committal and tentative, that the Choir contemplates giving a performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius' in Queen's Hall, London, next Spring. Dr. Weekes's Choral Society will perform 'Elijah' at the end of October, and are preparing for a Wagner memorial concert after Christmas, in both of which efforts they will be assisted by Dr. Weekes's Orchestral Society.

Turner's 'Festal Song' was sung at St. John the Baptist's Church, Devonport, on September 12, by a choir of forty voices, with Mr. A. T. Townsend at the organ. A new organ was opened in St. Mary's Church, Devonport, on September 18, with a recital by Mr. Reginald Waddy.

DEVONSHIRE.

The daily concerts given in the new Pavilion at Torquay are proving very successful, and the Municipal Orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Basil Hindenberg, is steadily raising its standard of performance and of programme. Each week artists visit for solo vocal and instrumental work, and on September 9 a visit from Herr Sapellnikoff constituted a special event, his chief number being the Tchaikovsky B flat minor Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. A Grieg concert is announced for a future date, with a visit from Madame Grieg.

In Dawlish Parish Church, on August 27, Mr. G. H. Gregory gave an organ recital, with assistance from Miss Dorothy James (viola) and Mr. H. Lang Jones (baritone).

Miss Violet Clark gave a violin recital at Crediton on September 18, being assisted by Mrs. Wallace Masland (contralto), Mr. Otto Milani (violin), and Mr. Edgar Samways (pianoforte).

CORNWALL.

At a concert given at the Lizard on September 3, the performers included Madame Joan Sutherland, Messrs. Arthur Trew ('cello) and Herbert Ferrers (pianoforte).

EDINBURGH.

Visit by MM. Kreisler and Busoni on October 5, and by the New Symphony Orchestra on October 10, will be the opening events of a season which, as far as our present knowledge is a guide, will be both interesting and eventful. The former inaugurates a series of recital concerts, organized by Messrs. Methven Simpson, or Mr. Percy Harrison, or by Messrs. Paterson, in which the names of Paderewski, Melba, Ysaye, Bauer, Culp, Pugno, Gerhardt, Lamond, Casals, Akté, Elwes, and Kreisler loom largest.

The outstanding feature is, of course, the series of twelve Monday orchestral concerts (November 11 to February 3) given by Messrs. Paterson with the Scottish Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Emil Mlynarski and three visiting conductors—Herr Balling, Herr Peter Raabe, and Sir Henry Wood. The sketch-programmes announce the first performances in Edinburgh of Strauss's 'Also sprach Zaruthustra,' Rachmaninoff's second Symphony, Bantock's overture, 'Œdipus at Colonos,' and other works.

The Choral Union (Dr. T. H. Collinson) announce 'The Messiah,' Beethoven's 'Choral Symphony,' and, in conjunction with the Dunedin Association, Mackenzie's 'The Cotter's Saturday night,' MacCunn's 'The Cameronian's dream,' and Learmont Drysdale's 'Tamlane.' Mr. Kirkhope's choir will be engaged upon Dvorák's 'The Spectre's bride,' part-songs, and madrigals. Mrs. Alexander Maitland's choir and the Edinburgh Bach Choir will continue to join in the choral life of the city. The University Choral Society have selected 'The death of Minnehaha' and Cowen's 'John Gilpin' for performance. But the most striking choral event that the season has in store is the promised performance, by Mr. Moonie's choir, of Bantock's 'Atalanta in Calydon.' It has not hitherto been announced as the first performance in Calydonia!

There still remain to be mentioned the University Historical Concerts, concerts by the Amateur Orchestral Society and by the Millar Craig String Quartet, some Young People's and Saturday Popular Concerts, the further concerts of the Dunedin Association, and many isolated events.

Lastly, the Quinlan Opera Company play at the Lyceum Theatre from December 9 to 14, and introduce 'Louise' to Scotland.

GLASGOW.

On August 27 Mr. Herbert Walton began his fifteenth series of organ recitals in the Cathedral, thus heralding the approach of the musical season of which the following forecast is given.

The Choral and Orchestral Union's season, which opens on November 12, promises several attractions. On the choral side there will be the first performance in Scotland of Wagner's 'Parsifal' (Act 3), and an interesting novelty in Part 1 of Bantock's 'Omar Khayyám' (conducted by the composer). The other choral selections are Brahms's German 'Requiem,' Sullivan's 'The Golden Legend,' and, as usual, 'The Messiah.' The orchestral programmes, although generally on familiar lines, will include not a few novelties. The Scottish Orchestra of eighty performers will be under the direction of Mr. Emil Mlynarski, and Mr. Henri Verbrugghen will fill the offices of leader of the orchestra, chorus-master, and conductor of two of the choral concerts. Among the brilliant array of solo vocalists and instrumentalists engaged, the name of our townsman Mr. Eugen D'Albert is conspicuous.

The Bach Choir's programme includes the 'St. Matthew' Passion, 'Sleepers, wake,' 'Jesu, priceless Treasure,' and a new version of the 'Peasants' Cantata,' in addition to an interesting instrumental selection and a lecture (with illustrations) by Dr. Walford Davies on 'The Art of Bach and modern Music.' The choral concerts will be conducted by Mr. J. M. Diack.

The Orpheus Choir (Mr. Hugh S. Roberton) announce two concerts, the first of which—a classical Scottish concert—should prove exceptionally attractive. A unique feature in connection with this fine choir is the issue of 'The Monthly Record of the Orpheus Choir,' introduced in order to keep the members in closer touch with the work of the Choir and to enable the conductor and officials to convey intimations and instructions to the members.

The Western Choral Union, under Mr. Wilfrid E. Senior, have chosen 'Acis and Galatea' for their principal study.

Cambuslang Choral Society, conducted by Mr. J. M. Diack, have in hand Cowen's 'St. John's Eve' and Mendelssohn's 'Loreley.'

The Young Men's Christian Association Choir (Mr. R. L. Reid, conductor) will perform 'The Messiah' at Christmas, and 'Judas Maccabæus' at their Spring concert.

Hamilton Choral Union (Mr. T. S. Drummond) have in rehearsal 'Messiah,' Mendelssohn's 'Come, let us sing,' and Elgar's 'Land of hope and glory.'

The Amateur Operatic Society (Mr. Wilfrid E. Senior) have selected German's 'Merrie England' for their year's work.

Under Mr. Harrison's auspices, four concerts will be given during the season, the leading performers being Paderewski, Pablo Casals, Kreisler, Backhaus, and the Queen's Hall Orchestra. On November 4 the Quinlan Opera Company will commence a fortnight's season at the Theatre Royal, their répertoire including a first performance here of Charpentier's 'Louise,' 'Tristan und Isolde,' 'Valkyrie,' &c.

The deficit on the last Choral Competitive Festival was so trifling that a call on the guarantors was deemed to be unnecessary. The executive will shortly issue the syllabus for the third annual Festival to be held in the Spring of next year.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

The first Philharmonic concert, which always definitely fixes the advent of our local winter season, occurs on October 8, when M. Kreisler will play Beethoven's Violin concerto. Of the usual series of twelve concerts, Sir Frederic Cowen will conduct six. It is satisfactory to note that the rather adverse feeling manifested by the members of the choir, in a memorial presented to the committee with regard to choral performances (notably the 'Elijah') to be conducted by one or other of the 'guest conductors,' has been smoothed over. There can be no doubt that the engagement of eminent 'visiting' conductors, both for choral and instrumental work, has quickened public interest in these famous concerts.

In addition to the choral works previously reported, Dr. Walford Davies's Birmingham Festival work, 'Song of the Sun,' will be performed, and other examples of music by native composers will be afforded by York Bowen's Pianoforte concerto (to be played by Miss Irene Scharrer), Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennel's dance,' and Bantock's 'The Pierrot of the Minute.' The season's programme also includes Elgar's 'The Music Makers,' Mozart's 'Requiem,' 'Elijah,' Brahms's 'Alto Rhapsody,' selection from Berlioz's 'Romeo and Juliet,' and Max Bruch's 'Lay of the bell.' With regard to the revival of this powerful setting of Schiller's fine poem, it is thirty-three years since the composer conducted its first performance in Liverpool. He was shortly afterwards appointed resident-conductor of the Philharmonic Society in succession to Benedict, and it is interesting to recall that the vocal principals included Miss Lillian Bailey (afterwards Mrs. Henschel), Madame Enriquez, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Henschel, with Mr. Best at the organ.

The Welsh Choral Union will sing Mr. Granville Bantock's new choral symphony, 'Atalanta in Calydon,' at their first concert on November 16, an announcement arousing keen anticipation. Mr. Harry Evans is making sure of sufficient weight and variety of choral tone by procuring the co-operation of the Manchester Orpheus Glee Society and the Birkenhead Gitana Ladies' Choir.

The Liverpool Choral Society, under Mr. Percival Ingram, will perform 'Messiah,' Rossini's 'Stabat Mater,' and Gounod's 'Redemption,' at their three ensuing concerts, and it will be noted with relief that the Catholic Philharmonic Society has received sufficient promises of support from the Catholic community, hitherto rather lukewarm, to warrant two concerts, at which will be sung Beethoven's Mass in C and Mozart's 'Requiem.'

The Ormskirk Musical Association will sing the concert-version of German's 'Merrie England' at their first concert, and 'Messiah' at the second, probably a wise submission to the eternal financial considerations which afflict committees.

The Walton Philharmonic Society will give two concerts, at which will be sung Stanford's 'Revenge,' and Gade's 'The Erl-King's Daughter.' It is satisfactory to hear that under Mr. Albert Orton this young Society is paying its way.

Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' will occupy the attention of the West Kirby Choral Society, under Dr. W. B. Brierley, while the Port Sunlight Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. F. H. Seddon, and under the powerful presidency of Sir W. H. Lever, announce three choral concerts, the first being devoted to 'A night with opera,' and the second and third to 'Messiah' and 'Elijah' respectively.

The musical operations of the Sunday Society will be resumed in St. George's Hall on October 27, under the accomplished director, Mr. John Lawson. A number of orchestral novelties are contemplated, and some noted soloists are to be heard. Public interest in these Sabbath afternoon functions is apparently unabated.

The Castellano Italian Opera Company, who are very popular here, gave a week's performances in the Shakespeare Theatre, commencing September 16. They opened with Verdi's 'Traviata,' in which Madame Defral won distinction as Violetta. This was followed by well-worn favourites in 'Faust,' 'Maritana,' 'Trovatore,' and the equally popular 'Cavalleria Rusticana' and 'Pagliacci.' Rossini's 'Barber of Seville' was the chief novelty of the week, and well displayed the vocal and histrionic abilities of this estimable company.

The Quinlan Opera Company, for their fortnight's visit commencing October 21, will be located in the Royal Hippodrome, a huge music-hall, which will give them the advantage of a larger stage and auditorium than on their previous successful visit to this city. An attractive scheme has been drawn up, the chief novelty being a performance of Charpentier's 'Louise' for the first time in English.

At the first meeting of the session of the local section of the I.S.M., on October 19, Dr. E. Markham Lee will lecture on 'Debussy,' and other lecturers are to include Miss Mary Spencer on 'Pianoforte Technique,' Mr. W. A. Wrigley on 'Edward MacDowell,' and Mr. Montagu-Nathan on 'Taste in Music.' Dr. A. W. Pollitt retains the position of local hon. secretary.

The concerts of the Akeroyd Symphony Orchestra are to be reduced to six, instead of eight as formerly, but the promoters intend to try the experiment of increasing the orchestra and engaging notable soloists, both instrumental and vocal. Mr. Akeroyd's programmes are happily drawn up, and offer the best in music, whether lively or severe. There are no miscellaneous concerts which give greater pleasure or are more worthy of support. The Societa Armonica, which Mr. Akeroyd also conducts, will give only two concerts this season. The Society has lost an enthusiastic supporter by the removal of its late hon. secretary, Mr. Dudley Johnston, to the Metropolis.

With regard to other orchestral performances, several important fixtures are announced, including a solitary visit from the Hallé Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Balling, on January 25, and from the Queen's Hall Orchestra, with Sir Henry Wood, on March 5. On the Cheshire side, the Liscard Orchestral Society, under Mr. Philip R. Smart, and the Oxton and Claughton Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. James E. Matthews, will offer interesting programmes. In the city, the Rodewald Concert Club, of which Sir C. V. Stanford is president, will resume its fortnightly Monday concerts on October 14.

Mr. Percy Harrison announces his usual season of four concerts in the Philharmonic Hall, and this experienced and successful entrepreneur has engaged Mr. Paderewski for the first concert on October 17. Two welcome visits will be paid by the Brodsky Quartet, and the St. Petersburg Quartet will also appear on two occasions. Pianoforte recitals are also announced by Messrs. Lamond, Herbert Fryer, Josef Greene, and in one direction and another there is every indication of a busy Winter season approaching.

The Liverpool United Methodist Choir, consisting of the combined choirs of the Liverpool and District United Methodist Churches, have decided upon performing Haydn's 'Creation' and Stainer's 'Crucifixion.' Mr. E. Malcolm Kelly has been re-appointed conductor.

The Liverpool Symphonic Chorus, also conducted by Mr. E. Malcolm Kelly, have commenced rehearsing for their second season's work, which embraces a series of five concerts to be given at the David Lewis Theatre.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

The arrangement of the series of Beethoven concerts which Balling is to conduct in Edinburgh in the last week of February next, has occasioned considerable delay in the issue of the Hallé prospectus, and even now the expected full details are not available for every concert. The Edinburgh visit will mean one miscellaneous concert in the Hallé series, probably a distinguished chamber music party.

There are numerous modifications and additions to the scheme as foreshadowed in the July issue. The most notable omissions are Reger's 100th Psalm, Bach's 'O Ewigkeit,' Beethoven's 'Kaiser Josef II.' cantata, Humperdinck's 'Spielmann's Lust und Leid,' and Boecklinn's 'Fantasien.' It appears the Mahler Symphony will be No. 1, and not No. 4 or 6, and Bruckner's No. 8 and 9 are to be included, as well as his Te Deum. The additions are most welcome, and include Erich Korngold's 'Comedy Overture,' Reger's 'Symphonic Prologue' and 'Lustspiel' Overture, Holbrooke's 'Queen Mab' Scherzo, a suite by Roger Ducasse, 'Gnomentanz,' by Bleyle, 'Elfenreigen,' by F. Klose, and two works by Richard Mandel—an overture to a 'Gascony Tournament' and 'Hymn to the Rising Sun.' Truly a brave beginnning! May its promises be amply realised, for this scheme is the completest justification of the severe criticism of the Society's policy during the later years of the Richter régime.

The 1912-13 season will be opened by the Bauer-Casals-Thibaud trio, who give the first concert of note on October 4; the Quinlan fortnight of opera, October 7-19, preceding the opening of the Hallé season on October 24.

The series of eight Gentlemen's Concerts will be resumed on October 28. Balling will direct the four orchestral concerts, and the following artists have been engaged: Misses Agnes Nicholls, Gerhardt, Lindenberg, Doris Woodall, Paula Hegner, Messrs. Byard, Campbell McInnes, Charles Neville, d'Albert, and Feuermann.

The coming Winter promises performances of Bantock's 'Atalanta in Calydon' in Manchester, Liverpool, Edinburgh, and Sheffield, and it is a matter of legitimate local pride that, following the initial Hallé performance of the work in its entirety, the next performance of this choral symphony is to be conducted by another Manchester musician, Mr. Walter S. Nesbitt, his famous choir being joined by contingents from Liverpool and Birkenhead, prepared sectionally by Mr. Harry Evans, the Manchester Orpheus returning the compliment in November by singing in the work under Mr. Harry Evans's leadership.

Early October will also witness the eleventh meeting of the now far-famed Blackpool Musical Festival, which has this year far exceeded its past records both in the breadth of its appeal and the number of those participating; the week, October 8-12, will witness no fewer than seven thousand men, women, and children contributing a share to this democratic music-making.

Several appointments in the Manchester district must be mentioned. Mr. Walter Evelyn, the conductor of one of our best local amateur orchestras, succeeds Mr. H. Lyall-Taylor in the Derby Orchestral Society. At Alderley Edge, Mr. R. H. Wilson follows the Rev. Colin Bell in the Choral Society conductorship, and Dr. Keighley has been appointed to a similar position in the Stockport Vocal Society.

A notable success was secured at the Hippodrome, on October 16, by the production of Signor Leoncavallo's new opera 'I Zingari,' under the composer's own direction. The work occupies one hour in performance.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE AND DISTRICT.

Sir Edward Elgar has appropriately dedicated his new choral work, 'The Music Makers,' to 'my friend, Nicholas Kilburn,' who, though nominally concerned in industrial matters, has devoted a great part of his life to producing the creations of 'The dreamers of dreams' and of 'The movers and shakers of the world.' The three choral Societies conducted by this indefatigable worker are to sing this fine composition during the coming season. The Middlesbrough Musical Union will include it in their programme for April 9, which also contains Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and Goetz's 'Nœnia.' 'Elijah' will be given in December. Two chamber concerts will be included in the scheme: the St. Petersburg Quartet and Miss Dorothy Silk will appear at one, in November, and Pianoforte trios by Miss M. Elzy, Mr. Sammons, and Mr. H. Withers will be played at the other. The Sunderland Philharmonic Society will perform 'The Revenge' at their first concert, and will ensure a full house by giving 'Elijah' at the second. The Leeds Symphony Orchestra will appear at each concert. The Bishop Auckland Musical Society will produce the new Ode at their second meeting, with the same orchestra, and the first concert will be devoted to chamber music. The St. Petersburg Quartet and Miss Dorothy Silk will appear.

The Central Hall Choral Society (Councillor Arthur Lambert) have had a prosperous season, and are happy in having a balance of £22 to their credit. Selections from Gounod's 'Faust' and two familiar oratorios figure on the prospectus for the winter. Mr. John Walton, a choir-trainer of exceptionally high ability and of serious ideals, has retired from the conductorship of the Bywell Choral Society, and will be replaced by Mr. J. Heywood, the choirmaster of Jesmond Wesleyan Church, Newcastle. It is proposed to perform Parry's 'Ode to St. Cecilia's Day.'

The fine choir of Elswick Road Wesleyan Church will sing Elgar's 'The Kingdom' on November 13—a bold undertaking, but one thoroughly justified by their record of achievements. South Shields Choral Society (Mr. M. Fairs) intend rehearsing Hubert Bath's 'The Wedding of Shon Maclean,' and Dvorák's 'Spectre's Bride.'

Mr. Percy Harrison has issued copious announcements for the coming season. The scheme is the best that that organizer has yet presented, and it is fervently to be hoped that the public will reward his excision of that musical monstrosity the 'ballad concert' by giving him increased support. Again, the Literary and Philosophical Society are devoting one fifth of their miscellaneous lecture course to musical subjects. Principal Hadow, whose presence always causes an overflowing house, will appear twice, the first time speaking on 'Some English Song-writers' and the second acting as annotator of a programme to be given by the Newcastle Glee and Madrigal Society. Mr. Cecil Sharp will speak on his favourite subject, and Dr. Walford Davies will make a welcome reappearance and discuss 'Thought and Feeling in Music.'

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

The prospect for the coming season in this city is decidedly rich and very varied. The Sacred Harmonic Society's programme includes Berlioz's 'Faust,' with Miss Esta D'Argo, Mr. Frank Mullings, Mr. Robert Burnett, and Mr. William Downing as soloists; 'A tale of Old Japan' (Coleridge-Taylor); Hubert Bath's 'Scottish' Rhapsody; 'The wedding of Shon Maclean,' with Miss Emily Breare, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Stewart Gardner; and 'Elijah,' with Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Ivor Walters, and Mr. Herbert Brown. The works by Coleridge-Taylor and Hubert Bath will be new to a Nottingham audience. At the two orchestral concerts given by this Society the chief works will be Brahms's 'Academic' Overture and Beethoven's fifth Symphony (C minor) at the first concert; and the overtures to 'Der Freischütz' (Weber), 'Die Meistersinger' (Wagner), and Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony (E minor). The vocalists at these orchestral concerts will be Mr. Edward Davies and Miss Alice Baxter. The concerts will be conducted as hitherto by Mr. Allen Gill. Mr. H. Winn Reeves retains the post of leader, and Mr. Frederic Wyatt will be the organist. Of course the usual 'Messiah' performances will take place on Boxing Day.

The only change necessary to mention is that the office of the Society is now at Fould's music warehouse, Chapel Bar, Nottingham.

The Nottingham Charity Subscription Concerts, which opened so brilliantly last season, give three concerts, with a fine array of talent. Probably the most attractive will be the coming of the Beecham Symphony Orchestra.

The Nottingham Subscription Concerts have increased their number to five, of which the first presents the eminent artists Kreisler and Busoni, the second Ada Crossley and Ben Davies, the third Gervase Elwes and Carreño, the fourth Phyllis Lett and Holman, finishing with Sir Henry Wood and the Queen's Hall Orchestra, the latter announcement being a welcome intimation to Nottingham, where Sir Henry did such good work some dozen years ago.

Madame Wilson Moulds has arranged a concert recital of Bizet's 'Carmen,' in which the principals are represented by both local and London artists.

A visit from Madame Melba, Mr. Edmund Burke, Ysaye, and Backhaus is announced for the week following the Goose Fair (October 7).

The lectures, musically illustrated, at the University College here, which for some years past have been so successful, will be on 'Welsh Folk-song,' by Mrs. Mary Davies, 'Modern French Music' (two lectures), by Mons. E. Fannière, and on 'Brahms and his Vocal Music,' by Mr. Allen Gill.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

A determined effort is being made to establish orchestral music in Sheffield. A fourth series of orchestral Promenade Concerts is announced, and it is satisfactory to learn that the small committee of four—who, from motives of public spirit are promoting the scheme—speak of increased public appreciation and support. Mr. J. A. Rodgers will again conduct a professional orchestra of some sixty players, led by Mr. Arthur Catterall. The dates are October 29, November 26, January 28, and February 25. At each concert there will be a concerto and a symphony. The symphonic works include Strauss's 'Tod und Verklärung,' Schumann's 'Rhenish' Symphony in E flat, Beethoven's No. 4, and Brahms's No. 2 in D. The programmes also comprise the Overture to, and a long selection from, 'Die Meistersinger,' 'Casse Noïsette' Suite, the 'Dream pantomime' from 'Hansel und Gretel,' Bizet's 'l'Arlesienne' and 'Jeux d'Enfants' Suites, Berlioz's 'Le Carnaval Romain' and Mozart's 'Zauberflöte' Overtures, and numerous shorter works. Included in the list of concertos are examples by Saint-Saëns (No. 2, pianoforte), Paganini in D (violin), Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole' (violin), Franck's 'Variations Symphoniques' (pianoforte), Boellmann's 'Variations Symphoniques' (violoncello), and Godard's Suite for flute and orchestra. The concerto soloists will be Misses Marguerite Melville, Winifred Christie, and Joyce Brown, Messrs. Arthur Catterall, Maurice Taylor, and J. Lingard. The vocalists will be Misses Lilian Dillingham, Dorothy Silk, Myra Dixon, and Nina Samuell-Rose.

Georg Schumann's 'Ruth' has not been taken up by the choral Societies as eagerly as was anticipated after its brilliant performance at the last Sheffield Festival. Its phenomenal difficulties no doubt deter even adventurous choralists. However, it is to be heard on December 17, when the Sheffield Amateur Musical Society will perform it under Sir Henry J. Wood's direction. For the Spring concert of the same Society, Brahms's German 'Requiem' has been chosen for performance, to be conducted by Mr. J. A. Rodgers.

The Sheffield Musical Union are to be commended for their enterprise in choosing Professor Bantock's choral Symphony, 'Atalanta in Calydon,' as their chief study during the Winter. The Sheffield singers will be reinforced by a large contingent from the Leeds Choral Union, totalling a huge choir of five hundred, which Dr. Coward will conduct. The date is April 10, 1913. The late Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' and Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' are the choral works to be given at the Society's first concert on November 14.

The Sheffield Choral Union announces two concerts to be given under the direction of Lieutenant Suckley. At the first, on November 25, Mendelssohn's 'Loreley,' and a concert-version of Gounod's 'Faust,' will be performed. Later in the season 'Elijah' will be given.

YORKSHIRE.

Though all the plans of the various concerts are not yet made public property, some of the principal Societies have issued prospectuses, from which a partial forecast of the coming season may be made. Most prominent of all is the admirable programme of the Bradford Subscription Concerts—eight in number, four purely orchestral, one orchestral and choral, two instrumental, and one a 'Melba' concert. Among the orchestral works are Elgar's second Symphony, which Mr. Landon Ronald and the New Symphony Orchestra are to interpret, Brahms's third Symphony, Tchaikovsky's fifth, and Dvorák's 'New World.' Less familiar are Delius's 'Appalachia' Variations, Reger's 'Lustspiel' Overture, Thuille's 'Romantic Overture,' a Serenade by Braunfels, Wallace's 'Villon,' and the 'Macbeth' of Richard Strauss. The principal choral work is Brahms's 'German Requiem,' and among the artists who will take part are Mr. Balling and the Hallé Orchestra, Kreisler, Casals, Max Pauer, Eugen d'Albert, and Busoni. By comparison, the Leed's Philharmonic series of four concerts, one of which is given up to 'Messiah,' is less striking, but it includes at least two important works—Bach's B minor Mass and Richard Strauss's 'Also sprach Zarathustra' which has not yet been heard in Yorkshire. Mozart's G minor Symphony, Saint-Saens's C minor Symphony, Reger's 'Lustspiel' Overture, and Wallace's 'Villon' are to be heard, and the choral works will include Bach's second Sanctus in D, Elgar's 'Bavarian Suite,' Balfour Gardiner's 'News from Whydah,' and C. Wood's 'Dirge for two veterans.' The conductors are Sir Henry Wood, Mr. Balling, and Mr. Fricker. The Huddersfield Subscription Concerts are of the usual entertaining character. Eight in number, they include an orchestral concert by the Hallé Orchestra, under Mr. Balling, and visits from Carreño, Sapellnikoff, Backhaus, Adela Verne, Zacharewitsch, and Melba, and an element of sensation in the appearance of three 'infant phenomena.' The Leeds Choral Union, of which Dr. Coward is the conductor, rely upon standard works for two of their three concerts, 'Messiah' and Berlioz's 'Faust,' but at the third propose giving Bantock's remarkable choral symphony, 'Atalanta,' for which occasion the choir will be augmented by members of the Sheffield Musical Union (which is undertaking the same work this season) to a force of 400 voices, and a very remarkable effect should be the result. The Huddersfield Choral Society, another of Dr. Coward's Societies, also places its reliance on the old favourites, 'Messiah' and Berlioz's 'Faust,' but by way of a novelty intends to give the late Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' which is also promised by the Bradford Old Choral Society — whose other works are 'Messiah' and 'Elijah.' The Middlesbrough Musical Union, which always shows artistic enterprise, promises one of the earliest performances of Elgar's new Birmingham work, 'The Music Makers'—which, by the way, is dedicated to this Society's conductor, Mr. Kilburn—along with Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and Goetz's 'Nœnia.' The same Society will also give 'Elijah,' and has established an annexe to its usual choral concerts in the shape of a couple of chamber concerts, given in a smaller hall, an enterprise which shows a welcome catholicity of taste.

We are informed from many sources that the South African tour of the Quinlan Opera Company gave general satisfaction. An article in The State, a South African paper, quotes as a common remark the half-complaint: 'I seem to be able to appreciate nothing since I heard the Quinlan Opera Company!' Other Press articles reflect the same feeling. M. Paderewski's tirade, prompted by the bad treatment he undoubtedly received in certain localities, has spread the idea that South Africa as a whole is unresponsive to the best in music, but the evidence of Mr. Quinlan's success removes this slur upon the country.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

Aberdeen.—The programmes announced by the various choral Societies in and about Aberdeen foreshadow a season of exceptional activity. The newly-formed Festival Chorus of 240 voices has already started rehearsals, under the direction of Mr. Warren T. Clemens, for the Festival of 1913. The Bach Choir is preparing Bach's 'My spirit was in heaviness' and 'God's own time,' and will proceed to other motets and cantatas. Peterhead Choral Society will perform 'The Messiah,' 'The wedding of Shon Maclean,' and Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet.' These Societies are also conducted by Mr. Clemens, whose Church Choral Society has undertaken to perform 'A tale of Old Japan' and Brahms's 'Requiem.' The Choral Union (Mr. A. Collingwood) will give Elgar's 'The Kingdom' and Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet.' The programmes of the first two concerts to be given by the University Musical Society, under the direction of Professor Sanford Terry are interesting and well-devised selections of choral and orchestral numbers.

Brighton.—It has been decided to hold the Festival on November 12—16 instead of in the Spring. The works chosen are 'The Music Makers,' Samson and Delilah,' Berlioz's 'Faust,' 'A tale of Old Japan,' 'Gallia,' 'Carmen,' and a Wagner selection. Mr. Lyell-Taylor is conductor-in-chief. We understand that £200 has already been collected from the sale of tickets.

Dingwall.—A successful recital was given before a distinguished audience at the Masonic Hall on September 17 by Miss Isobil Munro, a talented pianist of thirteen, who is about to continue her studies in London.

Dunedin (N.Z.)—The ninety-eighth concert of the Liedertafel was given at the Burns Hall, on July 17, under the direction of Mr. Jesse Timson. The part-songs sung by the choir of forty voices included popular numbers by de Rillé and Dard. The soloists were Miss M. Walton, Mr. A. H. Reid, and Mr. J. H. Oliver.

Harrogate.—On the occasion of the Kursaal Symphony Concert given on August 28, Sir Edward Elgar made his first visit to Harrogate in the capacity of conductor. He directed the performance of the second 'Wand of Youth' Suite, the Overture 'In the South,' the 'Variations,' and the 'Imperial March,' before a crowded audience that displayed great enthusiasm. Mr. Julian Clifford gave an admirable interpretation of Schumann's Pianoforte concerto.

Melbourne.—The Conservatorium of Music of the University of Melbourne gave its mid-winter concert on July 19, before an audience which completely filled the Town Hall. The programme included movements from Pianoforte concertos by Beethoven, Schumann, Saint-Säens, and Grieg; Violin concertos by Vieuxtemps (E major) and Wienawski; also pianoforte, violin, and vocal solos. A full orchestra, consisting mainly of students, accompanied the concerted numbers.——On July 23, a concert was given by the Philharmonic Society in honour of Mr. George Peake, who has retired from the conductorship. Under the direction of his successor, Mr. Alberto Zelman, Coleridge-Taylor's 'The death of Minnehaha,' and Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' were performed, Miss Maude Harrington and Mr. Horace Stevens being the soloists in the former work.

Rhondda.—Mr. Percie G. Smith's Orchestra has created a record for Welsh orchestras by winning first prize at the National Eisteddfod for the third time. The syllabus of the lecture-concerts that Mr. Smith has given with this organization details an admirable scheme which could only have arisen from the highest ideals and must have had a wide educative influence.

Timaru (N.Z.).—Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' was performed on June 19 by the Choral and Orchestral Society, under the direction of Mr. H. Nevill-Smith. The solo parts were taken by Mrs. Gower Burns, Mrs. E. J. Le Cren, and Mr. Alex Moore. Mrs. Burns, Mr. G. A. Andrews, Mrs. A. White (violinist), and Mrs. N. D. Mangos (pianist) contributed to the miscellaneous part of the programme, which included Thomas's 'Raymond' Overture, played by the orchestra.

Foreign Notes.

BERLIN.

On September 7, Herr Emil Paur, the successor to Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the Royal Opera, made his first appearance and earned considerable success in a performance of 'Die Meistersinger.'——Among the novelties to be performed at the Symphony concerts of the 'Blüthner-orchestra are 'Wächterweise,' by Paul Juon, a Konzertstück by Leopold van der Pals, Hausegger's 'Natursymphony,' a Pianoforte concerto by Halfdan Cleve, 'L'hiver,' by Ernest Bloch, and an 'Aubade' by Cyril Scott.——The season of the Kurfürstenoper was opened on September 7, when Kienzl's opera 'Der Kuhreigen' was given for the first time under the direction of Herr Cortolezi. Other works to be given here shortly include Mozart's 'Così fan tutte,' 'Susannens Geheimnis,' by Wolf-Ferrari, Offenbach's 'Die Grossherzogin von Gerolstein,' 'König Harlekin,' by G. H. Clutsam, and Richard Strauss's 'Feuersnot.'

BRUSSELS.

Humperdinck's Königskinder,' Puccini's 'Girl of the golden West,' a new three-act opera by Buffin entitled 'Kaatje,' Vincent d'Indy's 'Le chant de la cloche,' Massenet's 'Roma,' and Saint-Saëns's 'Proserpine' will be given for the first time at the Théâtre Royale de la Monnaie during the coming season. Among the more interesting works to be revived are Mozart's 'Magic Flute,' Lalo's 'Le Roi d'Ys,' Massenet's 'Le jongleur de Nôtre-Dame,' Bruneau's 'L'attaque du moulin,' Debussy's 'Pelléas et Mélisande,' Beethoven's 'Fidelio,' Meyerbeer's 'Robert le Diable,' and 'La Fiancée de la Mer' by Jan Blockx.—— At the Waux-Hall M. Victor-Vreuls recently conducted a concert of his own very interesting compositions with great success. The programme included his 'Cortège heroïque,' 'Triptyque,' for contralto solo and orchestra, the Poème for violoncello and orchestra, and a symphony with violin solo.

DARMSTADT.

During the coming season the following works will be given for the first time at the Court Opera, viz., Gluck's 'Iphigenia in Aulis,' Weber's 'Die drei Pintos,' Adam's 'Wenn ich König ware' (Si j'etais roi), 'Onkel Dazumal,' by Dalcroze, Dohnányi's 'Der Schleier der Pierrette,' 'Pelléas et Mélisande,' by Debussy, Massenet's 'Manon,' and Richard Strauss's new opera 'Ariadne auf Naxos.'

DRESDEN.

M. Jaques-Dalcroze, the now famous pioneer of rhythmic gymnastics, has lately been occupied with the composition of an opera, 'Prometheus,' which is nearly completed.——The Robert Schumannsche Singakademie (conductor, Herr Karl Pembaur) will give performances of Elgar's 'The Apostles' and Nowowiejski's 'Quo vadis' during the coming season.——On August 11, the ensemble of the Royal Opera opened the season at the Königliches Schauspielhaus (pending reconstructions at the Opera House) with a revival of Gounod's comic opera 'Der Arzt wider Willen.' A few days later a three-act opera, 'Stella Maris,' by Alfred Kaiser, was given for the first time.

FRANKFURT.

A new opera, 'Der ferne Klang,' by Franz Schreker, was produced with exceptional success at the Opera House on August 18. The composer (who is also the librettist) shows genuine invention, and technical mastery of no mean order. The work seems likely to enter the répertoire.——Among the works performed at the last season's Museum concerts were Elgar's Variations, conducted by Herr Mengelberg, and Richard Strauss's Symphony, 'Aus Italien,' under the composer's direction. The Signale considers the former work 'undoubtedly one of the most interesting that has come to us from across the water.'

HELSINGFORS.

The Czar of Russia has granted an annual pension of 2,000 Finnish Marks to the composer M. Jean Sibelius. The artist had already an annual life-subsidy from the Finnish State.——An unusually interesting programme is announced for the fourteen subscription Symphony Concerts to be given under the direction of Herr Georg Schneevoigt. Among the works included are a Symphony by Furnhjelm, Melartin's fourth Symphony in C minor, the Symphony in G major by Mahler, Scriabine's third Symphony, Richard Strauss's 'Symphonia domestica,' 'Also sprach Zarathustra,' and 'Don Quixote,' Bruckner's eighth Symphony, the tone-poem 'Taormina,' by Boehe, Glière's 'Die Sirenen,' Hugo Wolf's 'Italian Serenade,' Glazounoff's tone-poem 'Das Meer,' 'Die Jahreszeiten,' by Palmgren, 'Rondes des Printemps' and 'La Peri,' by Debussy, 'La mère l'Oye' and 'Rhapsodie Espagnole,' by Ravel, 'Der Wald rauscht,' by Conus, Jarnefeldt's symphonic-poem 'Korsholm,' 'Kikimora,' by Liadoff, a Sarabande for chorus and orchestra, by Roger Ducasse, Symphonies in C major and D major, 'Finlandia,' 'Eine Sage,' and 'Pan und Echo,' by Sibelius, and Elgar's Overture 'Cockaigne.'

LEIPSIC.

Herr Otto Lohse has commenced his work as chief conductor of the Opera with a fine performance of Beethoven's 'Fidelio.'——The annual summer concert given by the Riedelverein (conductor, Dr. Georg Göhler) in the Thomaskirche was devoted to French church-music. The programme included Gounod's cycle of motets, 'Die sieben Worte,' for solo voices, with four-part and eight-part chorus, a motet, 'Tantum ergo,' by Saint-Saëns, and Roger Ducasse's 'Mariengesänge.'

MANNHEIM.

The new season at the Court Opera was recently inaugurated with the revival of Cherubini's rarely-heard masterpiece, 'Der Wasserträger,' directed by Herr Bodanzsky.

MUNICH.

The English play 'Kismet' has been given at the Künstlertheater with interesting incidental music by Gustav Mrazek.——The annual Mozart and Wagner Festival performances have taken place with great success. The Mozart operas were given at the Residenztheater, under the direction of Herr Bruno Walter, the cycle including two performances of 'Don Giovanni,' 'Le Nozze di Figaro,' 'Così fan tutte,' and one of 'Die Entführung aus dem Serail' and 'Bastien and Bastienne.' Among the most successful of the artists were perhaps Herr Feinhals and Mesdames Bosetti and Maud Fay. The day after the termination of the Mozart performances, the Wagner cycle commenced at the Prinzregententheater with 'Die Meistersinger' (conducted by Herr Röhr). The scheme further included 'Tristan und Isolde' and the 'Ring des Nibelungen,' all directed by Herr Walther. Herr Feinhals again covered himself with great distinction, as did Miss Edyth Walker, Madame Schumann-Heink, and Messrs. Knote and Zador.

NEUCHÂTEL.

The twenty-second Eidgenössische Sängerfest has taken place with great success. The Festival showed throughout the high standard of the competing male choirs through all the four different grades, ranging from easy folk-songs to art-songs of the greatest difficulty. Among the most interesting items performed were Reger's 'Requiem' and 'An das Meer,' 'An die Hoffnung,' by Volkmar Andreae, and a beautiful a cappella motet, 'Exaudi deus orationem meam,' for seven-part chorus, by Giovanni Gabrieli (1557-1612), sung by two thousand singers.

PARIS.

On August 22, M. Claude Debussy celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his birth.

PYRMONT.

A Festival devoted to compositions by Dvorák took place on August 14, 15. Two orchestral concerts and one chamber concert were given. The programme included the 'Hussitska-Overture,' the Symphony in D minor, Op. 20, two Legends for orchestra, the concertos for Violin (soloist Herr Havemann) and Violoncello (soloist Professor Paul Grümmer), and the symphonic-poem 'Das Heldenlied.' The Pianoforte quartet in E flat, four Biblical songs from Op. 99, and the Serenade for wind instruments were also heard.

REGENSBURG.

The Prince Regent of Bavaria has given orders for a bust of Wagner to be placed in the 'Valhalla' built by Ludwig I. on the Danube.

REVAL.

Wolf-Ferrari's choral work 'La vita nuova' has been performed for the first time by the Nikolai-Gesangverein.——The Kammermusikverein gave a concert devoted to compositions by Bach, including the Suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, the Trio-Sonata from 'Das musikalische Opfer,' and the Pianoforte concerto in D minor. At another concert Brahms's Clarinet trio and an interesting String quintet by Glazounoff were heard for the first time.

STOCKHOLM.

The Nya Filharmoniska Sälskapet (conductor, Herr Armas Järnefeldt) has given a concert of rarely-heard works by Beethoven. The programme included the 'Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt,' the Phantasy for solo pianoforte, chorus and orchestra, and the Mass in C major.——At the concerts of the Musikföreningen, Professor Franz Neruda introduced Bossi's 'Canticum canticorum,' Wolf-Ferrari's 'La Vita nuova,' and Bruckner's Te Deum. Peterson-Berger's interesting opera 'Arnljot' has been revived at the Royal Opera.

TEPLITZ.

A number of interesting works, including Weingartner's second Symphony, Reger's Violin concerto in A major, Op. 101, Mozart's rarely heard 'Linzer Symphony' in C major (No. 36), a new Symphony by Malata, and Mahler's fifth Symphony were played at the Philharmonic Concerts during the recent season.

ZOPPOT (NEAR DANZIG).

The works chosen for the pastoral performances (now an annual event) at the open air theatre (Walbühne) included Smetana's 'Verkaufte Braut' and Humperdinck's 'Hänsel und Gretel.' The latter work proved particularly attractive in these surroundings.

M. KUSSEWITZSKY'S VOLGA TOUR.

During the summer M. Sergius Kussewitzsky made his second concert-excursion on the Volga. He chartered the comfortable steamer 'Kniaschna' ('The Duchess'), and with his orchestra and a number of friends visited the towns from Rybinsk to Astrachan, and back to Nischni-Novgorod. Twenty Symphony concerts were given, the programmes of which included well-known classical works and compositions by Tchaikovsky, Glinka, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Liadoff, Rachmaninoff, and Glazounoff. The whole enterprise proved a great success in every respect.

Miscellaneous.

The Report of the Manchester Public Free Libraries Committee provides some interesting statistics with regard to the Henry Watson Music Library. This collection is estimated to contain 33,000 volumes, besides a great quantity of sheet music. We learn that the number of borrowers' cards now in force is 1,046, and that the number of volumes, &c., lent out from April 1, 1911, to March 31, 1912, was 59,900—over 40,000 more than in the previous twelve months.

Classes in Morris-, Country- and Sword-dances, and in singing games will be held during the Autumn by the English Folk-Dance Society. The classes will meet on Thursday and Friday evenings from October 3 to December 5, at Trinity Church House, 200, Great Portland Street; Reeve Hall, 76, East Street; and the South Western Polytechnic, Manresa Road, Chelsea. Information will be supplied by Miss Walsh, 11, Hart Street, W.C.

A committee of residents in Waterford, with influential backing from outside, invites public support for a scheme to commemorate the centenary of William Vincent Wallace's birth by (1) erecting a statue in Waterford; (2) founding a scholarship; (3) providing an organ in some public building at Waterford. The secretary is Mr. Edmund Downey, 50, O'Connell Street, Waterford. Cheques should be made payable to 'The Treasurers, Wallace Fund.'

Twickenham Philharmonic Society, augmented by the Thames Valley Operatic Society and other local singers, will make its first visit to central London during the coming Autumn season and perform Coleridge-Taylor's 'The song of Hiawatha,' under the direction of Mr. Arthur Cowen. The choir and orchestra will together number about 200.

We read that the W—— B—— Choral Society are to rehearse for performance during the season, Handel's 'Acis and Galatea,' and Dvorák's 'Spece's Bridge.' A new work by Dvorák is certain to be interesting.

We hear that Miss Margaret Fairless, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, a thirteen-year old violinist studying with Professor Sevcik, has astonished the Bohemian musicians and public with her virtuosity.

Charles E. Connell, a pupil of York Minster Choir School, has obtained the Associate Diploma at Trinity College of Music.

Sir Henry Wood has resigned the conductorship of the Westmorland Festival.

Answers to Correspondents.

Constellat.—The opening of the 'Meistersinger' Overture should be taken at about ♩ = 112. Slacken slightly on p. 7 (miniature full score). Resume the tempo on second line of p. 8. Avoid the common tendency to make a marked allargando on last two bars of p. 20. Pp. 21-22 meno mosso. E major about ♩ = 88. Quicken on p. 28. From last bar p. 29 about ♩ = 92. Quicken slightly on pp. 36-37, and from p. 38 resume original tempo. Broader from last bar of p. 55. These directions are given from a (perhaps faulty) recollection of Richter's interpretation.

Cricket.—Normally, yodelling is not possible to ladies. It is done by the interchange of the natural and falsetto tones of a baritone voice. Even to a baritone, our advice would be: learn by ear from a yodeller. Consult your milkman, especially if he sells Swiss milk.

Clarinet.—Consult Lieut. Miller's book on the Military Band in Novello's Primer Series (2s. 6d.), and the book by Mr. Farmer, acknowledged on p. 655.

L. J. M.—The habit is not so prevalent as you imagine.

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

This Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique, and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

FIFTY-SIX BOOKS, PRICE ONE SHILLING EACH.

FROM THE ABOVE:

SELECTED PIANOFORTE STUDIES

PROGRESSIVELY ARRANGED BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

IN TWO SETS (EIGHT BOOKS), PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE EACH BOOK.

The present collection of Studies is designed to provide teachers with a short course of Pianoforte Technique adapted to the needs of the average pupil, the intention being to spare the teacher the labour of choosing a sufficiently varied selection from the large mass of material existing, and at the same time to ensure that the different departments of technique shall be undertaken in the order which experience has proved to be the most beneficial.

The Studies are grouped in two Sets, and are so arranged that the different Books in which they are contained may be taken in consecutive order, but pupils who are already further advanced than the elementary stage represented by Set I. may commence at once with Set II., which will be found to be complete in itself, and to illustrate all the essential elements of technique.

Where additional studies are desired, or studies on certain subjects which are not touched upon in this series, the larger collection, published under the title of "Progressive Studies" (from which the present examples have been selected), is of course available.

The Competition Festival Record

No. 51.

THE ROYAL NATIONAL EISTEDDFOD OF WALES.

Wrexham.—September 2 to 7.

After an interval of twenty-four years, Wrexham had the honour of holding the Eisteddfod this year. A spacious, well-arranged pavilion capable of seating 10,000 people was specially erected. The success of the Festival was never for a moment in doubt, as the town is the centre of a very large industrial population, and easily accessible from both North and South Wales. There were competitions as usual in music, poetry, literature, arts, crafts, and science, and, excepting the choral competitions, the striking feature was the capture of both Crown and Chair by a young poet of the new school—the double-event occurring for the first time in the history of the Eisteddfod—who hails from Rhyd-ddu, a lonely village at the foot of Snowdon. The music committee are, on the whole, to be congratulated on having made a good selection of test-pieces, though there were some unworthy exceptions. Gloom was cast over the opening of the Festival by the sad news of the sudden death of Coleridge-Taylor (one of the appointed judges), a well-known figure at Welsh Eisteddfodau and a general favourite with Welsh competitors.

The First Day.

The first of the choral competitions on Tuesday—madrigal and sight-singing—was a very depressing affair, one only of the two entrants having turned up, and their performance being very weak. By three o'clock the Pavilion was well-filled with an attentive and sympathetic audience. Though only four choirs took part in the chief choral competitions, much interest was aroused by the fact that two of them, Carnarvon and Cardiff, were previous winners in this class. The test-pieces were (A), 'Cum Sancto Spiritu,' from Cherubini's Second Mass in D minor; (B), 'Llais y Gwanwyn' ('The voice of Spring'), by J. H. Roberts, and (C), Elgar's noble 'Go, song of mine.'

Cefn Mawr Choral Society (conductor, Mr. G. W. Hughes) sang first. In (A), with the exception of the basses, who sang firmly, the tone was diffuse, and rather shrill in the sopranos. There was an inclination to force the pitch upwards; some of the attack was not neat, there was very little rhythmic grip, they over-indulged in staccato, with a consequent loss of breadth and dignity, and there was not much resource displayed in working-up a climax. The movement of parts was precise and the utterance fairly clear. (B.) The tone again lacked cohesion, there was no pp, and the gradations of tone were not well-controlled; but there was some compactness, in spite of a rather puny rhythmic accent, and the words were clearly sung. (C.) This was taken at rather a quick pace, and the mood was not realised; it was too matter-of-fact. The important alto syncopation in the counterpoint to the tenor melody was not accurately fitted in, and there was a little confusion in the difficult pages (8 and 9). A little more attention to time values, in notes and rests, would have resulted in more breadth, and the detached phrasing was a weakness. But there were good points, as in the second movement, which was invested with much expression, and technically it was a creditable achievement for a choir that hitherto has appeared only in smaller competitions.

Cardiff Harmonic Society (conductor, Mr. Roderick Williams) followed, and it was evident in the first bars of the Cherubini (A) chorus that this was a finely-toned choir, all departments being well-equipped. The pace was a little unsteady, there was an inclination to sing sharp, and the rhythm was not firmly grasped. The pianoforte was very much in evidence, and often swamped the choir. The phrasing was broad, fairly fluent, and the last portion made a very good climax though there was a little tired feeling in the tone. (B.) Though the singing was smooth, it was rather languid, and they failed to get the requisite 'lightness of touch.' The pitch dropped in the second page, the tone sounded weary, in spite of its good quality, and they failed to make the singing interesting. (C.) The opening was most impressive—in the right mood, and finely sustained. The tenor melody was beautifully sung—the melody being unbroken. The D major section began a little loudly, but the gradual working up was splendidly controlled and always finely sustained. Up to the eighth page, it would be difficult to imagine a finer interpretation. Things got a little wrong here, and the pitch dropped seriously. But they never lost the mood, and the final bars were very impressive. For the most part it was a masterly, uplifting performance.

Rhymney Gwent Choral Society (conductor, Mr. Daniel Owen) began the Cherubini chorus (A) a little timidly, but very soon got comfortable, and the bright resonance of the tone—in spite of a little 'openness' in the tenors, and a little thin tone in the sopranos—coupled with absolutely secure intonation, refreshed the audience. There was very good rhythmic grip, abundant vitality, which was well-controlled, magnificent basses, who moved with a firm tread throughout, and a distinct sense of climax. It was all fluent, it lived, and in spite of a little 'worn' tone, the final page was thrilling in its exultation. The Welsh part-song (B) was just a little disappointing in the opening, but here again the singing was full of vitality, the utterance first-rate, and though the pitch dropped, they sustained the interest to the end. A lighter rhythmic treatment was expected. In (C) 'Go, song of mine,' there was extreme caution, especially in the difficult sections, but the singing was often emotional—the tenor melody being beautiful and touching in its tenderness. They did not work up the D major section as did the Cardiff choir, nor was the grandeur of the phrase 'being purified' quite realised. Some of the tonality was vague, but it was a very creditable performance, and had much tenderness and 'mood' in the opening and closing phrases.

Carnarvon Choral Society (conductor, Mr. John Williams) were the last choir to sing. The tone was clear, resonant, and well balanced. In (A), the opening of the chorus was clearly defined in rhythm, and the part-singing very well-controlled. All went splendidly to letter G, when the pitch was forced up. A misunderstanding at H caused momentary confusion, and with a less experienced conductor there might have been disaster. The treatment throughout was thoughtful and musicianly, though marred to the end by the sharp singing. (B.) Apart from a tendency to sing sharp, this was quite a remarkable performance. The tone was beautiful, the rhythmic accent was perfect, and there was poetry in it all. The large audience was, of course completely carried away by this fine presentation of light, dainty singing by such a big choir. (C.) This was an exhibition of splendid drill, all the nuances were accurately performed, the pp, p, mf, sf, &c., were all carefully adjusted, and there was very little to find fault with in the technique. But it was not as emotional as we had heard it previously, the broad melodies were detached—commas were a hindrance to them, and the last 'Go' made a curious effect (the Cardiff people were nearest to the perfect delivery of that last tender, wistful chord). The splendidly-controlled and unified tone was again a valuable asset.

Before giving the adjudication, Mr. Granville Bantock delivered an important speech, which has since attracted much attention, and it is hoped that the Welsh people will take to heart what he said and will rouse themselves to prompt action. All that he said has been said before by more than one Welsh musician, but to very little purpose.

The marks awarded were as follows, the maximum being 100 for each piece:

	A.	B.	C.	Total.
Cefn Mawr ..	75 ..	67 ..	79 ..	221
Cardiff	83 ..	65 ..	93 ..	241
Rhymney ..	87 ..	88 ..	88 ..	263
Carnarvon ..	87 ..	93 ..	93 ..	273

It is interesting to note that Mr. John Williams conducted the winning choir in the Chief Choral at Wrexham in 1888; won the second prize at Swansea in 1891; divided the first prize at Festiniog in 1898, and won first prize at the London National Eisteddfod in 1909. This constitutes a record.

The Second Day.

Wednesday was a comparatively quiet, unexciting day of rather small things. Of the fourteen children's choirs that had entered, ten appeared. The test-pieces were (a) 'The Snow' (Elgar), which was beyond the powers of most of the choirs, and (b) 'Croesan Wanwym' ('Welcome, springtide'), by Mr. J. Pryce Hughes. None of the singing reached a high standard, though three choirs stood out clearly from the rest. A Welsh choir from Rhos (Mr. J. Hartley Davies) secured first place, whilst two English choirs gained the second and third prizes, viz., Lake Road Band of Hope, Portsmouth (Mr. W. T. Sayer), and Knowle Bank School Choir, Huddersfield (Mr. J. Griffiths).

The competition was a little tedious and uninteresting, and the conclusion was once more forced upon old stagers that the National Eisteddfod is not the place for children's choir competitions. A children's day—entirely devoted to juvenile competitions—would be another matter. The competition for ladies' choirs was only moderately good, and the sympathies of critics went out to the Tredegar Ladies' Choir—the best-equipped choir undoubtedly—in their misfortune with the pitch, which robbed them of the first-prize.

The test-pieces were (a) 'Newid Cywair' ('A change of key'), by Bryceson Trehearne, (b) 'The River King' (Schumann), (c) 'Encinctured with a twine of leaves' (Coleridge-Taylor), and the result as follows:

	Conductor.	Marks.
Bangor Ladies' Choir ..	Mr. Thomas Thomas	178
Tredegar „ „ ..	Miss Margaret Francis	174
Glantawe „ „ ..	Mr. W. T. Devonald	160
Barry „ „ ..	Mr. W. M. Williams	147
Maelor „ ..	Mr. L. Newton Wright	146

(Maximum marks, 200.)

The Third Day.

The Pavilion was thronged with a huge crowd of people on Thursday long before the arrival of Mr. Lloyd George, who was due at two o'clock, with the result that some of the competitions had to be conducted under most distressing conditions. Only the people in close proximity to the platform could hear anything of what took place, the tumultuous crowd behind being too excited and impatient to listen to music. The test-pieces were reduced to the smallest possible limits, and in the case of the quartette the judge had to stand quite near the singers in order to hear any sounds at all. This, of course, was disconcerting and unfair to the competitors, and rendered the proceedings farcical. The competitions could easily have been held in one of the many available preliminary test rooms.

It was a day of great excitement, and the Eisteddfod proper had to take a 'back seat'; 17,000 people passed the turnstiles, and this exclusive of the reserved seat and season ticket-holders. The takings were nearly double those of the chief choral competition day, so that the visit of the Chancellor was of great financial value to the promoters. We need not dwell here upon the unpleasant episode of the ejection of interrupting suffragettes. After the chairing of the bard, things gradually settled down, and by the time the second choral competition began all was peace, seven choirs taking part. This proved to be a very interesting competition, and the singing of the winning choirs reached a higher all-round standard than the singing in the chief choral competition. The test-pieces were well-chosen, and provided ample contrast in style. They were (a) 'Death, I do not fear thee' (from the Bach Cantata, 'Jesu, priceless Treasure'), (b) 'My love is like the red, red rose' (Emlyn Evans), and (c) 'On Himalay' (Bantock).

Mr. Granville Bantock expressed his pleasure at the treatment of 'On Himalay,' which was beautifully sung by the winning choir (as were the other pieces)—the Clwydian Ruthin Choir (Mr. R. Harris Jones). It is interesting to note that Mr. Jones conducted the winning choir in this class at the previous Wrexham National Eisteddfod in 1888. The second prize went to the Penrhyndeudraeth Choir (Mr. D. Lloyd Evans), whilst the Mid-Rhondda Orpheus Society (Mr. Emrys Richards) came close behind. Had the material of this last choir been as good as their conductor's perception, they would have stood higher in the competition.

The marks awarded were: Clwydian Choir, 277; Penrhyndeudraeth, 258; Mid-Rhondda, 239; Chesterton (Mr. W. Walker), 234; Brynmawr (Mr. W. T. Angel), 227; Brynyrefail (Mr. R. Lloyd Roberts), 219; Brymbo (Mr. R. J. Roberts), 209.

As the competition concluded at the hour announced for the evening concert to commence, no adjudication was delivered, the total marks only being announced. In addition to the splendid singing of the winning choir, the playing of the two orchestras in the morning leaves a pleasant memory. The overture to 'Prometheus' (Beethoven) was an admirable test, and Mr. J. Garforth Mortimer's Cardiff Orchestra gave a crisp performance, coupled with good tone and excellent intonation. The insistence of a very pointed rhythmic accent, however, did not make for breadth. Mr. Percie Smith's Ynyshir Orchestra, though fewer in numbers, gave a most musicianly interpretation. It was dignified, broad, and very well contrasted, and they thoroughly deserved the first prize.

The Fourth Day.

Of late years the final day has proved a 'great attraction. It is the day of the male choirs. But this year the crowd was not so great, neither was there the usual enthusiasm and excitement, and affairs generally were rather languid. Fourteen choirs had entered, but of these only half the number appeared. It was much regretted that among the absentees were two well-known English choirs, namely, Mr. J. C. Clarke's Southport Choir and Dr. Siddall's St. Helen's Gleemen.

The test-pieces were (a) 'Deep Jordan's banks' (Cyril Jenkins), (b) 'The lost love' (D. Vaughan Thomas), and (c) Mr. Bantock's 'The glories of our blood and State'; both the latter were sung unaccompanied. Mr. Bantock's piece proved a severe test, the difficult harmonies and the sudden modulations being beyond the technique of some of the choirs. The piece is an impressive one, very highly coloured and eloquently expressive, the diminished thirds in the 'creep to death' section being most original and weird in effect. The staccato marks were so much misunderstood and sometimes so wilfully abused, that one felt it would have been better to have allowed the marcato only to remain in the printed copy.

The Mountain Ash and District Choir made a rather uninspiring beginning, the intonation being unsettled, whilst the tone lacked unity and blendful quality. There were inaccuracies, and the part-singing was not clear. There was some earnest expression in places, and the Allegro con fuoco was sung better than the rest of the piece. In the second piece, there was the same faulty intonation between one part and another even, but there was some sentiment in the expression, in spite of an inflexible rhythm. The technique was quite inadequate to meet the great demands of Bantock's music, and the intonation was troubled throughout.

Penywern (Dowlais) was a much better choir in every way. In the first piece there was some error of judgment in the treatment of accent in the opening, and the intonation was dubious at the first climax. The utterance was first-rate, there was good rhythmic feeling (except in the jerky treatment of page 7), and the expression was earnest. The basses sang splendidly, but the tenors were a little hard and inclined to shout in the ff's. A very good performance was given of the second piece, the pianissimo tone being quite beautiful. The middle section was a little hurried, and they did not achieve everything possible in the way of sentimental expression and subtle, floating, tone. In the third piece, the pitch was not secure, the Allargando was not sufficiently spread, and the chording was not true in the Lentamente. But there was some very good expression, the 'creep to death' section being remarkably well done, and ghostly in its effect. There was not enough resource for the expansive sections, the tenors lacked resonance, and the closing bass phrases were not significant.

Ebenezer Mission (Swansea) immediately arrested the attention in the opening phrase of (a), the tone being beautifully soft and mellow. The intonation at the first climax was not true, and the part-singing was not quite defined. But the second verse was most expressively sung, and quite in the right mood. The last verse was also well sung, though the ff was a little disappointing. In the second piece there was again beautiful sonority in the tone, which was always well-controlled, and the expression was most convincing in the second and third verses. In the first verse the rhythmic accent was a little heavy.

The Bantock piece had been well prepared, and the splendid sonority of tone was a valuable asset. There was a thorough grasp of the rhythm, though curiously enough they misinterpreted the six-four phrase at the close, and the minims were sung as crotchets of the preceding bar The broad phrases were given with splendid dignity, and more than made up for the striking, ghostly effect of the previous choir.

Plymouth Orpheus came next with a much clipped opening phrase—they sacrificed everything for an explosive final consonant. This cut up the sostenuto in an irritating way. The contrasts were violent, and the tone occasionally strident. There was abundant energy, which however was often misplaced. Occasionally one got a well-controlled phrase and a touch of real expression. In the second piece there was some pleasant tone, and an occasional good phrase, but here again the singers could not resist the hissing of sibilants, and a good deal of the treatment was caricature. Strangely enough, they displayed uncommon technical skill in the treatment of Mr. Bantock's music, which was quite accurately sung and always up to pitch—this was an achievement. The chording in the Lentamente pp section was the best we got in the competition, and the difficult 'creep to death' section was never in any doubt as to accuracy. There were the same faults of utterance, the same over-eagerness, but there was also some excellent expression.

Maritime (Pontypridd) were not secure in the opening of the first piece—the tone was diffuse, the pp too loud, and the forte climax a little loose. The second verse was expressively sung, but later the intonation became troublesome. They recovered themselves, and achieved an effective climax. On the whole, it was an unequal performance, and a little disappointing from so good a choir and conductor. The disappointment was immediately dispelled by an altogether charming performance of the second piece. The pp was again a little loud, but the melodic treatment betokened the conductor's art—it was so complete, the tapering was so well done, the accompanying of melody so well adjusted, and there was beautiful expression. The opening of Bantock's piece lacked dignity, the staccato being greatly exaggerated here and later: there was again no pp, the octaves were not true, and there was a misinterpretation of the last page. But there was some very good tone, very good unanimity in movement, and very satisfactory chording.

The Swansea and District Choir followed. Here we had beautiful sonority and depth in the tone, which 'welled up' to magnificent climaxes. This was the only choir that sang the ad libitum phrases without the pianoforte,—and with very good effect, though they were just a shade sharp. There was distinct mood in the singing, the alternation of fear, longing, hope, and ultimate triumphant faith being eloquently expressed. Dr. Thomas's part-song was treated in almost faultless style. It was as poetic as the treatment by the Maritime Choir, with the advantage here of deliciously delicate pianissimo singing, wonderful gradation of tone, and extraordinary sonority. It is doubtful whether anything more beautiful has been heard in any previous Eisteddfod. In the last piece the tone was again a valuable asset. The pace was a little erratic at first, the Poco largamente—'Some men with swords may reap the field'—was too jaunty in treatment, the triplets in the Lentamente section were not accurately measured, and the pitch went down slightly. But there were phrases that impressed by their dignity and vivid colouring. The gradation of tone was well-managed, and the important bass phrases in the last page were treated with due significance.

Colne Orpheus were the last to sing, and in the first piece did not do themselves anything like justice. The tone lacked cohesion, there was not the unanimity in attack and part-movement that we got from previous choirs, and the part-singing was a little loose. The second section displayed some good drill, but it was unemotional. They made a good ending so far as tone was concerned. The key did not seem to be thoroughly grasped in the opening of the second piece. There was very good gradation of tone later. The melodic phrases were poorly nourished, and occasionally there was a lack of control, but the last verse was beautifully sung. In Mr. Bantock's chorus the treatment at first was a little erratic. It was not firmly gripped, and the pace was undecided. 'Sceptre and crown' was delivered with fine energy. 'Creep to death' was very expressive. In the recapitulation there was some loss of vitality, and the pitch dropped. But the performance was one of great merit, there was much vivid colouring, significant utterance, and the basses came out admirably in the final section. It was a more 'orchestral' treatment than we got by the other choirs.

Dr. Walford Davies, who spoke for the judges, made some prefatory remarks on the same lines that Mr. Bantock took on Tuesday. This admiration for the natural musical gifts of the Welsh people, plus the admonition for lack of culture and fine technique, had been so often publicly expressed at the competitions, and so very little notice is taken afterwards, that the oft-repeated statement sounds platitudinal Strong, immediate action is needed if the Welsh people wish to take their proper place amongst musical nations.

The award was as follows:

	Conductor.	a.	b.	c.	Total.
Mountain Ash and District..	Mr. Hugh Ellis ..	68 ..	71 ..	61	= 200
Penywern (Dowlais)	.. Mr. Evan Thomas	87 ..	90 ..	84	= 261

Colne Orpheus ..	.. Mr. R. Greenwood	76 ..	84 ..	90	= 250

The standard reached in solo-singing was only moderately high this year, the most striking performance being that of Mr. Ramsey Clarke, of Manchester, who gave a most dramatic interpretation of Henschel's 'Young Dietrich.' There was no discovery of any exceptional vocal talent, though the winner of the Welsh Soprano Solo—Miss Lottie Thomas, of Wrexham—received very high praise from the judge.

The instrumental solo-playing was good, without being in any way exceptional, and the most striking performance was the pedal-harp playing of the clever young Aberdare harpist, Master Taliesin Morgan. A special tribute is also due to the ladies who played in the Trio competition.

The chief results in the various competitions were as follows:

Soprano Solo (Open).—Madam Sylvia Hosgood, Cardiff.
,, ,, (Welsh).—Miss Lottie Thomas, Wrexham.
Mezzo-soprano (Open).—Miss Gladys Fletcher, Cardiff.
Contralto Solo (Open, and Welsh).—Miss Esther Cooper, Gwaencaegurwen.
Tenor Solo (Open).—Mr. Tom Bonnell, Pentre, Glam., and a Special Prize to Mr. John Thomas, Dunvant.
Tenor Solo (Welsh).—Mr. E. W. Bellis, Rhos.
Baritone Solo (Open).—Mr. D. Boddycombe, Pontardawe.
,, ,, (Welsh).—Mr. R. Isfryn Jones, Rhos.
Bass Solo (Open).—Mr. Ramsey Clarke, Manchester.
Boys' Solo.—Master Thomas Glyn Richards, Bootle.
Girls' Solo.—Miss Rose Jones, Brymbo.
Quartett (S.A.T.B.).—Dr. Siddall's party, St. Helens.
Old Folk-Song.—Miss Dora Rowlands, Llangollen.

Penillion Singing.—Mr. John Williams, Ponkey.
" " (under 18).—Mr. Joe ap Morgan, Gwaencaegurwen.
Triple Harp Solo.—Miss Freda Holland, Birkenhead.
Small Harp Solo.—1st prize, Miss A. C. Lloyd, Bala.
Pedal-harp Solo.—Mr. Taliesin Morgan, Aberdare.
Pianoforte Solo (Open).—Miss Crosland Taylor, Chester.
Violin Solo (Open).—Miss Enid A. Brock, Waterloo.
'Cello Solo.—Mr. Geraint Williams, Ystalyfera.
Flute Solo.—Mr. John L. Coups, Macclesfield.
Trio (Pianoforte Violin and 'Cello).—Miss Leadbetter, Miss Llewellyn Davies, and Miss Loxham, all of Wrexham.
String Quartette.—Mr. Greenhaigh's party, Bolton.

The Composition Classes were fairly numerous, and brought forth some work of exceptional merit, especially in the instrumental compositions for violin and organ. The prizes offered by the Eisteddfod Committee were won by Mr. Walter Williams of Bury, for the best orchestral arrangement of the accompaniments to two songs by W. Davies and R. S. Hughes. These were performed at Tuesday's concert. Mr. Cyril Jenkins (Treorchy) captured the prize offered for a bass song, and he also sent in the best descriptive male chorus, which was disqualified, since it had already been published by a London firm.

The prizes given by the National Eisteddfod Association were all won by Mr. Cyril Jenkins. These were for an Andante for organ, Reverie for violin, and three songs to words by Ceiriog. A portion of the prize for the latter was withheld, as the judges did not consider that the setting of one song reflected the spirit of the poem.

There was much confusion on the opening day—an overloaded programme and no time-table. The genial conductor —or master of the ceremonies—Llew Tegid, very neatly said that he had come to the conclusion that the chief use of the Eisteddfod programme was to enable him to display his skill in skipping from one item to another. Consequently, since no one was ready to proceed with item No. 5, he would skip to item 23, which was proceeded with! This was the case more or less all the week, and it is amazing that committees do not profit by past experience in this, as in other matters of management The marvellous thing is that the work is got through at all. But there are many who believe that if the happy-go-lucky method had to give way to a business-like method, and a well thought out rigid time-table as at English Competition Festivals, the Eisteddfod would not thrive as it does now! With all its faults, it is a wonderful institution. It is as full of vitality as ever, and it appeals to the whole nation as does no other national institution. Surely it is time to abolish children's recitations, small harp solos, &c., that can only be heard by a small fraction of the audience. Then in fairness to solo singers who prepare two songs, and are asked to sing one or part of one only in the Pavilion, as was the case at Wrexham, the marks obtained in the preliminary test (at any rate in the omitted song at the final) should be added to the marks gained in the Pavilion.

Mr. Peter Williams, chairman of the musical committee, in his address gave expression to a view that has on more than one occasion been publicly expressed by some Welsh musicians, viz., that an advisory board should—under the auspices of the National Eisteddfod—be appointed to help the local committees of National Eisteddfodau in the selection of test-pieces, in order to ensure a graded selection from year to year and to prevent the ebb and flow that now takes place.

The need of such a Board is strikingly obvious if one compares next year's disappointing musical scheme (Abergavenny) with the Wrexham programme. Most modern part-songs are a closed book to Welsh choirs. This should not be, and were there some system in the selection of music, some consideration for artistic development and less for gate-money, Welsh choirs would have the same opportunity of becoming acquainted with what is best—modern and classical—in choral music.

The judges were Mr. Granville Bantock, Dr. Walford Davies, Mr. Harry Evans, Mr. Dan Price, Mr. Owen Jones, Dr. Caradog Roberts, and Dr. Thomas.

The Concerts.

The promoters are to be heartily congratulated on the programme drawn up. Not only did they encourage Welsh composition by the inclusion of Dr. Thomas's 'Llyn y Fan' and Mr. Maldwyn Price's orchestral work, but they were public-spirited enough to include Brahms's noble 'German Requiem' in the week's work—a big step forward in the history of Eisteddfod concerts—in addition to Handel's 'Israel in Egypt.' The choir of 300 voices was an uncommonly good one, and had been well-trained by Mr. Wilfrid Jones, who deserves great credit for his work. The orchestra was quite capable this year, including as it did many of the most experienced Liverpool and Manchester players and led by Mr. Vasco V. Akeroyd.

Dr. Thomas conducted a very good performance of his work, which was first produced at Swansea Eisteddfod in 1907, and the impression created then was confirmed at Wrexham. The technique is skilful, and there is much effective colouring, both vocal and orchestral, in spite of many unconscious reminiscent phrases—mainly Wagnerian, though Mendelssohn's 'Wedding march' theme is heard, appropriately enough, in the final section of the work. Miss Amy Evans, Mr. David Ellis, and Mr. Powell Edwards were the soloists, and all did well. Mr. Maldwyn Price's orchestral pieces showed much promise, though there is nothing new in the material, and the Saltarello is surely modelled on Mr. Edward German's work! But one could discern a certainty of touch and a genius for orchestral colouring which raises great hopes for Mr. Price's future career. The 'Requiem' was given a capital performance chorally, but the accompaniments were rather ragged and uncontrolled. Madame Wilna and Mr. Ivor Foster both distinguished themselves in the solo work. After Brahms's 'Requiem,' Handel's 'Israel in Egypt' was rather disappointing. There was a lack of enthusiasm and grip, though the work had been thoroughly learned, and the long pauses between the choruses created uneasiness in the audience. The soloists were Miss Edith Evans, Miss Edith Davies, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Gervase Elwes, Mr. Charles James, and Mr. David Hughes.

Miscellaneous concerts of the 'very popular' order were given on Monday and Friday evening, Mr. Stephenson's Wrexham Orchestra taking part in the latter. The artists were: Monday—Madame Laura Evans-Williams, Madame Ada Crossley, Mr Hughes Macklin, Mr. R. Emlyn Davies, Miss Marie Novello (solo pianoforte), Mr. S. A. Duce (solo violin), and Mr. R. Purcell Jones (solo 'cello). Friday—Miss Edith Evans, Miss Gwladys Roberts, Mr. Thomas Thomas, Mr. Richard Evans, Miss Leadbetter (solo violin), and Miss Loxham (solo pianoforte).

The platform superintendent was Mr. Llew. Wynne. He greatly assisted the marshalling of the choirs whenever his organizing skill had a fair chance.

The following are additional criticisms of the singing in the male-voice class, held on the fourth day.

Mountain Ash.—Arranged with a very long front; two or three deep. Conductor entered after considerable interval.

(a) Sung in Welsh. Fair unity, but imperfect chord blending. Soon lost pitch badly. 1st tenor strained. Allegro attack alert here. Meno mosso, very severely accented. Why? Not at all expressive. Killed Cantabile. Last movement sung with no special animation or point. Tone always musical. Never moving or thrilling.

(b) Sung in English. At once tenors failed in intonation. Whole choir rarely chorded well. Lacked delicacy. Displayed poor technique; occasional spurts of good attack. The triplets were uneven. Lost pitch.

(c) Again the conspicuously bad chording, the intonation of the parts being in conflict. Bars 16, 31, 35 very bad indeed. Bar 43 began on wrong note. Bass an excellent tone. A laboured performance. Did not realise moods; missed intensity and significance. Lost a whole tone.

Penywern (Dowlais).—(a) Again a long formation. Query better more compact? Sung in English. At once a mood suggested by the words. Charged with significance. Big, imposing climaxes. Obvious unity in attack; sometimes too forcible. Technique excellent. Tone always musical; but not specially resonant. pp (pages 8 and 9) quite beautiful. Meno mosso well read, and the end movement had moving expression and great vitality. An interpretation!

(b) Welsh. Again the clear execution. Polished and delicate, and effects well proportioned, and sostenuto realised. Particularly sweet piano. The Welsh vowels blended attractively. A sincerely emotional and moving performance.

(c) Attack splendid. Execution fluent and secure. Expansions fair, if not imposing. The chief feature the well-prepared execution and the insight of the interpretation. Pitch was lost, unfortunately. The passage 'Creep to death' was splendidly done, going down to the depth of the words. [Note (after all choirs had sung): The interpretation of this section was the finest achievement of the whole competition.] The end, although below pitch, was delicately shaded and well controlled by conductor.

Ebenezer.—(a) English. A full, rich tone and a solemn opening. The inner parts well served. The tenor sometimes over-urged and tone therefore fell off in quality. Impressive expression. Meno mosso not quite cantabile enough. March of the rhythm at the end movement very good at first, then there was some hurry that hindered unity of attack. Picturesque, well-thought-out expression.

(b) Good tone and pretty blend at the opening. No especial attraction in the expression. Tone rough occasionally. Lacked daintiness and charm. Many good technical features. On the whole fair, but without special distinction. Not always in tune.

(c) Chording uncertain. Lower parts groping tonal attack. 2nd bass a fine tone; good reading at 'murmuring breath.' Bars 33 to 35 missed nobility of expression. The end bars were hazy as attack.

Plymouth. — (a) English. A full tone. Attack excellent. Basses rich. Tenors fair—overpressed occasionally—tended to shout at climaxes. A dramatic interpretation, but the colours were too pronounced—gaudy. The expansions were too great. The marks of expression were slavishly followed, and nearly always overdone. The control of the conductor was remarkable. The technique of the choir was excellent, but it was often misapplied. The last movement was brilliant, and the tone had a splendid ring.

(b) Much to admire in the exactness of the attack and the polish of the execution. But it was too machine-like—cold. Nearly every mark of expression was exaggerated, and seemed an end rather than a means. Colour for colour's sake!

(c) Industrious. Obviously rehearsed conscientiously. But again the misapplied technique. The dynamic contrasts were so vivid, one almost forgot what the words were about. Here and there an oasis of real, moving expression.

[Note.—If this conductor, who exhibits such high qualities as a trainer, can gain more insight as to the object of expression marks, and relate them to general interpretation, his choir will be an exceptionally fine one.]

Maritime (Pontypridd).—(a) Welsh. Small choir relatively. Seemed inexperienced. A sharp pace, and for a time well knit. The pointed staccato was a mistake—made rhythm wrongly dainty. Tone agreeable—the tenors excellent. Meno messo too fast, and not at all cantabile, and the accompaniment used forcibly as though loss of pitch was feared. The vitality of the last movement was a welcome surprise. Words fairly clear.

(b) Welsh. Very good part-singing. Well controlled; the choir seemed so plastic. Unity a conspicuous feature. The ebb and flow of the crescendo, &c., arranged with judgment, and the expression always of the sincere and arresting kind. An excellent performance.

(c) Good opening. Technique and tone fair, but no defined mood—too formal. Obedient to marks, yet not very expressive. Staccato overdone. Tenuto made staccato. The halves and thirds, bar 33, not correctly related. 'Creep to death' well-conceived. Some rather jerky effects marred an otherwise thoughtful interpretation. An excessive staccato on the last page, 'and blossom,' was distressing.

Swansea.—(a) English. A massive tone and rich blend. Like a fine organ, only better. Execution unified and under firm control. Moody. At the piu mosso there was a really beautiful cantabile—never defaced by intrusive staccato. The composer must have felt proud of his music here. The Allegro con fuoco was majestic and sung as though by one voice. A splendid bit of drill, and yet finely expressive. The meno mosso was sung unaccompanied, as it should be, and a thrilling, searching expression was revealed. The words here, referring to the River Jordan, are:

> I fear the land of light,
> Will never greet my sight;
> And I shall sink
> Beneath its surge.

Truly a solemn moment! The choir was dead in tune when the accompaniment entered. The final movement with its sanguine, ecstatic mood was wonderfully uplifting.

(b) English. Quite beautiful again. Just the tenderness called for and just the right amount of passion applied. A perfect bit of vocalisation. There was never the slightest tendency to exaggeration. The tenuto marks, especially those on the last page at 'in her grave,' which were hardly ever understood in other performances, were exactly right in treatment. The whole performance was a poem in tone.

(c) The start was impressive as tone, and the style was broad. Some fine moods realised. Tenors uncertain and diffident here and there. 'And must give up their murmuring breath' was finely done. A broadly-conceived interpretation, but with some defective details. Gave one the impression that the conductor knew the piece better than did the choir. The fine 'creep to death' passage had no particular effect. 'The garland withers on your brow' point was missed, and the style deteriorated. Did they feel any emotion here? The end was musicianly, but again there was nothing to stir sympathetic feeling.

Colne.—(a) English. A brilliant, ringing tone different from anything hitherto heard in the competition. Not very full. Opening movement sung with passionate yearning—just too fervid. 1st bass seemed weak for the balance. The expression lacked the indispensable sincerity—as though they did not take to the piece. The climax on the end page was exciting.

(b) English. Blend in pp excellent. Intonation of tenors uncertain. Some good dynamic effects, but again the expression lacked mood. Some tenderness achieved at the end.

(c) Again more technique of a high standard and not much depth of expression. The choir seemed to give mechanical obedience. The execution was fluent, and there were fine tonal climaxes. The end was imposing as tone if not so attractive as interpretation. [W. G. McN.

EALING.—August 24.

The Co-partnership Festival, held at Brentham Garden Suburb, Ealing, drew a satisfactory number of competing choirs, who had the advantage of Mr. Allen Gill's advice as adjudicator.

In a new class for male-voice choirs, the Temperance Union, of Willesden (Mr. Morgan Morgans), won the prize against five competitors, namely, Hertford Festival Choir, Horsham, Wood Green Adult School, Seven Kings Men's Meeting, and Cynthia Glee Society. In the contest for the Earl Grey Challenge Shield for Male-voice Choirs, Gloucester Choir (Mr. S. W. Underwood) were successful against Portsmouth (Mr. C. Weedon). The Excelsior Shield for Mixed-voice Choirs was won by Brentham (Mr. Albert Thompson) against Willesden (Mr. J. J. Bowen). There were junior choral contests in which Stratford (Mr. Alfred Sears) and Long Eaton (Mr. W. Woolley) won trophies.

The festivities included a pageant, 'Merrier England,' to which Mr. Albert Thompson's Brentham Choir contributed chorally.

CO-OPERATIVE CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

Rugby.—September 7.

The tenth annual competitive Festival of the Midland Section was a notable success. Ten entries were made in the section for mixed-voice choirs, and an advanced standard was shown by the competing bodies. Derby won the challenge shield for the fifth year in succession; Annesley Woodhouse were second, Grimsby third, and Leicester fourth. Prizes for solo singing were won by Miss Burchnall, Miss Elise Baggley, Mr. T. B. Hoyle, and Mrs. A. R. Speechly.

NEW BRIGHTON.—September 14.

This annual event, the twelfth of the series, passed off successfully, although the weather was bad. The choirs exhibited a high standard, some of the performances being splendid exhibitions of choral skill.

Children's Choirs (under 16 years of age).

The proceedings were held under the highly capable management of Mr. Llew. Wynne. Dr. McNaught and Mr. Harry Evans adjudicated, and Madame Maggie Evans and Miss Millicent Richards were the official accompanists.

THE BLACKPOOL FESTIVAL.

(October 8, 9, 10, 11, 12.)

Record Entries.

The entries for this Festival have now been received, and show the extraordinary interest the event excites. It would seem that the appetite grows upon what it feeds. As will be seen below, the vocal soloists alone number 608, and the choral entries in the chief class are unprecedentedly numerous, no fewer than seventeen choirs having undertaken to come forward. It is estimated that during the week there will be between six and seven thousand competitors.

The following is a compressed list of the entries. Duplicate entries for sight-reading, which are unusually numerous, are omitted:

	Entries.
Vocal soloists	608
Pianoforte soloists	130
Violin soloists	47
Viola soloists	6
'Cello soloists	10
Pianoforte trios	8
Vocal quintets	3
Vocal quartets	16
Vocal quartets (operatic)	3
Children's choirs	28
Old dances (schools)	12
Action-songs (schools)	11
Female-voice choirs	17
Church choirs	16
Male-voice choirs	22
Mixed-voice choirs	26
String orchestras	3
Full orchestras	2

The following are the names of the choirs that have entered for

The Chief Challenge Shield Class for Mixed-Voice Choirs.

1. Stourbridge Institute Madrigal Society (Mr. G. H. Woodall).
2. Coventry Co-operative Festival Choir (Mr. John Potter). (Winners of the Midland Festival Challenge Shield, May, 1912. Their first appearance at Blackpool.)
3. The Douglas Festival Choir (Mr. Noah Moore).
4. Sale and District Musical Society (Mr. Alfred Higson).
5. Walsall Madrigal Society (Mr. Frank Mullings).
6. Kidderminster Harmonic Society (Mr. R. A. Taylor).
7. Blackpool Glee and Madrigal Society (Mr. Herbert Whittaker).
8. Barrow Madrigal Society (Mrs. Bourne).
9. Mr. Aldous's Choir, Lancaster (Mr. J. W. Aldous).
10. The Scarborough Choir (Dr. Thomas Ely).
11. Blackpool Orpheus Glee Society (Mr. Clifford Higgin).
12. Hanley and District Choral Society (Mr. Ernest C. Redfern).
13. Stretford Glee and Madrigal Society (Mr. Thomas Corlett).
14. Colne Valley Vocal Union (Dr. T. E. Pearson).
15. Halifax Madrigal Society (Mr. Harry Shepley).
16. The Southport Choir (Mr. William Tattersall).
17. Blackpool Adelaide Street Choir (Mr. J. S. Warburton).

A novelty at the gathering will be an exhibition of Morris-, Country-, and Sword-Dances, on which Mr. Cecil Sharp will adjudicate.

The other adjudicators will be: Dr. McNaught, Mr. Percy Pitt, Dr. E. C. Bairstow, Madame Edith Hands, Mr. Frederic Austin, Mr. Hermann Klein, Mr. Isidore de Solla, Mr. F. Bonavia (strings), Messrs. Isidor Cohn and C. H. Fogg (pianoforte).

The late Mr. Coleridge-Taylor, whose death is profoundly regretted in competition circles, was to have been an adjudicator.

The hon. secretary is Mr. Lionel H. Franceys, and the general secretary, Mr. Frank Howard. Both should be addressed at the Festival Offices.

We may add that visitors from a distance need not fear difficulty in obtaining hotel accommodation at this season. Blackpool, in the estimation of many who know, is at its best in the early Autumn.

MORECAMBE.—April 29 to May 3, 1913.

The preliminary syllabus of this premier event is issued. It gives the tests for no fewer than fifty-four classes. In the chief open choral class they are as follows:

Mixed-Voice Choirs.

* Five-part Song, 'Music when soft voices die' (Bantock).
* Eight-part song, 'Spring' (Hathaway).
Five-part song, 'Thro' groves sequestered' (Holbrooke).
Five-part Madrigal, 'Ye that do live in pleasure's plenty' (Wilbye).

Male-Voice Choirs.

Part-songs.
- 'The sailor's return' (Fletcher).
- 'Wanderer's song' (Delius).
- 'Song of the robbers' (Weingartner).
- *'Dominus illuminatus mea' (H. Walford Davies).

* Specially composed for the Festival.

A performance by the Festival Choir of the late Coleridge-Taylor's popular 'Bon-bon Suite' (choral), to take place under the baton of Mr. Harry Evans, will be a tribute to the memory of the composer.

The programmes of the other concerts are not yet definitely announced, but it is certain that special notice will be taken of the death of Canon Gorton, who was one of the originators of the Festival.

In order to make it easier for choirs to enter for the chief choral classes in this event and the Festival to be held at Birmingham next May, it has been arranged that the tests to some extent shall be the same for both Festivals.

There will be two Church Festival services, conducted respectively by Mr. Harry Evans and Mr. Sydney Nicholson.

We trust that this scheme will receive the hearty support of choirs and soloists from all parts of the country.

ABERGAVENNY.

Royal National Eisteddfod.

August 4 to 8, 1913.

The tests in the principal music sections are announced to be:

Chief Choral Competition.

First part of 'St. Paul' (Mendelssohn).

Male-Voice Choirs.

(a) 'Fallen heroes' (Cyril Jenkins).
(b) 'Lead, kindly Light' (Prothero), unaccompanied.

Second Choral Competition.

(a) 'Theme sublime' ('Jephtha,' Handel).
(b) 'Isle of beauty' (J. H. Roberts), unaccompanied.

TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

WITH NUMEROUS MUSICAL EXAMPLES FROM THE WORKS OF THE GREAT MASTERS.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

THE ORGAN

BY

JOHN STAINER.

EDITED BY JOHN E. WEST.

An important feature of the present Edition of this invaluable and popular Organ Primer is the adoption of the now universally recognized system of fingering—1.2.3.4.5., which is here substituted for the older system—×.1.2.3.4.—in all cases where fingering is marked.

In the explanatory portion of the book, opportunity has been taken of briefly mentioning one or two of the principal additions and improvements to the instrument which have been made since the book was first issued.

Bearing in mind that the Author's aim was to assist, in as concise a manner as possible, the early steps of an organ student, the Editor has refrained from adding any further exercises or pieces to those which were already given. But the addition of a few extra fingering and phrasing marks seemed necessary here and there, and, in the five concluding pieces, the laying-out of one or two of the manual passages has been rendered clearer to the player's eye by means of a slight re-staving.

The admirable explanations and diagrams of the Tubular-Pneumatic and Electric actions have been supplied by Mr. L. Simon, of Messrs. Norman & Beard, Ltd.

THE TIMES.

It is a very happy work, full of a fresh, strong spirit of joyfulness. It opens with a simple pastoral theme which sets the tone of the whole and puts one in the presence of a strong personality brimming over with vitality. The swinging phrases of the "Rorate cœli desuper" begun by the soprano solo and taken up by the choir carry on the feeling and throughout the Ode is continuously woven out of these and similar materials. There is majesty in the call to the heavenly powers—"archangels, angels, and dominations"—to worship the Saviour, intimate tenderness in the appeal of the soprano solo, "Sinners, be glad and penance do," and the later stanzas calling upon all Nature in turn are touched with delightful suggestions of poetic feeling.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Sir Hubert Parry has given us a legitimate successor to "The Blest Pair of Sirens." . . . Dunbar's poem consists of six stanzas, each followed by the refrain "Et nobis Puer natus est," or nearly so. A lovely pastoral movement opens the cantata. . . . We have no composer, and have had none in the memory of living man, who could so well have extracted the liveliness from Dunbar's verses as Parry, none who could have maintained as well as struck the true note of healthy geniality, and maintained it so homogeneously, none who could have done this with a more marked individuality. . . . There is much that is beautiful for the soprano soloist, on this occasion Miss Ada Forrest, but nothing so lovely as the appeal to sinners to be glad unless it is the sublime gloriousness of the refrain of the fifth stanza and the superb sound of the chorus work in the final—a passage well worthy to rank with the famous close of Milton's Ode referred to at the beginning of this notice. . . . We are likely to hear far more of the Ode than of any of the immediately previous compositions by Sir Hubert Parry, and I, for one, will gladly be among the listeners whensoever called upon, for it is a work of sublime loftiness, of joyous feeling.

STANDARD.

It is difficult to decide which to admire more, the fidelity with which the composer repeatedly selects the same method to express his thoughts, or the ease with which he develops his subject and elaborates his contrapuntal themes. . . . There is some good eight-part writing, and the music for the double chorus in the final section is of characteristic strength and fibre, and ultimately develops into a powerful climax, which gives place to a serene treatment of "Pro nobis puer natus est," the refrain of the poem.

MORNING POST.

There is nothing complicated or diffuse in the music. The simple design adopted shows the hand of experience. Anything ornate would have been out of keeping with the nature of the poem. The customary resource of the composer is employed with full effect, and it remains yet another example of Sir Hubert Parry's power of writing vocal music that has a definite and individual ring. An appropriate atmosphere is established at the beginning by an introduction of pastoral character which creates a cheerful mental picture. The impression of simple joy is never disturbed throughout the work. Some broad unison effects from the chorus, a fine choral passage in Sir Hubert Parry's best style, illustrative of the celestial choirs, a melodious and well-written section for the solo voice, and a well-wrought climax before the calm end are the features in this gratifying work. . . . The fame of the work is likely to extend, carrying with it an increase of the renown of the composer.

STAR.

The composer has reproduced the archaic quaintness of the text and there is a fine joyousness about the music. It has an abundance of characteristic Parryish climaxes in which bustling figures tumble over each other in sheer exuberance of spirits, and sometimes, as in the charming pastoral opening, a higher imaginative note is touched. The skill with which the melody of the refrain is varied is notable.

FIRST SONATINA in A minor. Op. 74	3	6

"Must be classed as one of the finest works in modern organ literature. The first movement is practically in usual Sonata form. The development section is particularly brilliant, and the quiet cadence leading into the recapitulation is of arresting beauty."

"The slow movement, in the nature of a chaconne, is beautiful and restful. A brilliant cadenza leads to an exciting introduction to a most interesting triple fugue (confined to manuals). Afterwards the composer works backwards through the sections preceding the fugue, unwinding himself, as it were, before starting on a magnificent Coda befitting a magnificent work."—Daily Mail.

EXAMINATION QUESTIONS AND HOW TO WORK THEM

BY

CUTHBERT HARRIS,

Mus. Doc. Dunelm., F.R.C.O.

PREFACE.

This Primer is intended more especially for those who purpose presenting themselves for examination in the theory of music. While the subjects dealt with may be found in all examination schemes for musical degrees and diplomas, it is hoped that the following chapters may prove useful more especially to candidates for the diplomas of the Royal College of Organists.

The object of this book is to stimulate and cultivate method in answering examination questions. Considerable experience as an examination "coach" has proved the success of the method, herein followed, of dissecting the questions, and—by dividing the points for consideration under several heads—thus directing the student's attention to one point at a time.

JOAN OF ARC

AN HISTORICAL CANTATA

FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Few Cantatas are as rich in chaste melodies, charming choruses, and exquisite orchestration as Alfred R. Gaul's 'Joan of Arc,' performed by the Vocal Association in the Guildhall."—The Western News.

"Must enhance the high reputation of its composer."—Liverpool Courier.

"The inspiration of a highly-refined musician. . . . The Cantata is even a more masterly and beautiful work than 'The Holy City.'"—Huddersfield Examiner.

"No more charming Cantata than 'Joan of Arc' could have been chosen. It abounds in delicious music. There is not a tedious note in it."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Chronicle.

"Gives the listener a vivid and realistic impression, its attractiveness being continuous instead of spasmodic."—Bradford Observer.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description."—The Shields Daily News.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal parts, each, 1s.; Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100.

THE TEN VIRGINS

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Will be heartily welcomed by all who love the art of music."
—Newcastle Journal.

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard, and will assuredly be placed among the foremost compositions of this kind by present-day writers . . . treated in a thoroughly artistic manner . . . a perfect wealth of melody and striking individuality of style."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"Works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—the 'Holy City,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'The Ten Virgins.'"—Newcastle Daily Journal.

"The choral writing in 'The Ten Virgins' is alone something to be thankful for, and, as we have intimated, it is only one of the many musical virtues of the Cantata."—Leamington Chronicle.

"BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE CHOIR.—The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to encore every other number of the work. That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."

"The subject is an excellent one for a Cantata . . . a stronger work than 'Joan of Arc.' Melodious, vocal, and of moderate difficulty, and, like Mr. Gaul's earlier Cantatas, will be eagerly welcomed by societies in search of new works having these characteristics."—Newcastle Daily Leader.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever. Mr. Gaul has aimed at fine outline and telling colouring, and all that he has aimed at he has achieved."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; cloth, gilt 4s.
Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal Parts, each, 1s.; Words only, 5s. per 100.

The loan of instrumental parts may be had on application to the Composer, and full liberty is given to perform these Cantatas and to insert the words in any programme without further permission.

NOW READY. A NEW EDITION with larger Margins and improved Index of ANTHEMS

ANCIENT AND MODERN

Which contains 134 of the finest Anthems of the world, providing for every season of the Christian year and every occasion of the Church's life.

The Birmingham Gazette says: "Should prove a boon and a blessing to the Church throughout the world. Surely there never was such a book in such compass. There can be no doubt as to the brilliant future awaiting this most surprising book."

The Church Times says: "Great care has been taken in selecting from among the works of well-known composers, those which have stood the test of frequent use and are of recognised standard excellence, while the new compositions are of such merit as to warrant the belief that they will win a wide acceptance. We wish for this admirable collection the cordial reception it deserves."

The Guardian says:—"The collection as a whole is admirable."

The Musical Journal regards it as epoch-making in the matter of providing congregations with good anthems at the lowest possible cost. "Think of it—a hundred and thirty-four anthems for three shillings. The collection deserves a hearty welcome."

The Pall Mall Gazette says: "An excellent collection, convenient in form, clear in setting both of music and letterpress, contributed to by composers of justly merited fame. We are assured it will meet a real need, and consequently receive a hearty welcome alike from clergy, choirmasters, choirs and congregations."

The Westminster Gazette says:—"It is not surprising that the volume enjoys wide popularity."

THE MILITARY BAND

BY

GEORGE MILLER,

M.V.O., Mus. Bac. Cantab., &c.

Price Two Shillings.
In Paper Boards, Two Shillings and Sixpence.

It is a valuable sketch of a highly specialised subject, and none the less practical because seasoned with humour. The various instruments and their idiosyncrasies are tersely described, and their collective use is admirably illustrated.—Yorkshire Post.

No one is more worthy to speak on such a subject than Lieut. George Miller, and the book is one of great value.—Cheltenham Looker-On.

From this book it is possible to learn the compass and capabilities of each instrument. The explanations are admirably lucid and suggestive; and the final chapters, showing how a work composed originally for the concert-orchestra—Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony—can effectively be arranged for the military band, teaches more than all the text-books. We heartily commend this most excellent book.—Saturday Review.

THE EHREMAYER SYSTEM OF PIANOFORTE SIGHT-PLAYING.

A greater proficiency is obtained after three months' practice for a short time each day than can be obtained by ordinary methods after the drudgery of years of practising for many hours daily.

Recent letters include the following :—

Boscombe.

I have made very marked and steady progress since I began your course. I am now playing the accompaniments of a small orchestra, which I am certain I should never have been able to do before.

L. M. C.

Margate.

I cannot express my gratitude in words for the many benefits you have extended to me during my course of Sight-Reading. If it is in my power to recommend it in any way I shall not hesitate to do so.

CROTCHETS.

One description of crotchets is indispensable in music, but another sort is most dangerous when applied to practical playing or teaching. Isolated facts and fads can never, by being placed together, form a system, whereas for the complicated problems involved in playing a musical instrument, system is of paramount importance, as witness the frequent failures from ordinary tuition. Macdonald Smith's Method is free from crotchets and isolated notions. Its fundamental principles have stood the test of time, and its practical results are frequently described as "miraculous," "magical," &c. In "Light on Pianoforte Playing," sent free by Mr. Macdonald Smith, the principles on which his well-known System is based are fully described.

VINCENT D'INDY.

The Musical Times
AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.
NOVEMBER 1, 1912.

M. VINCENT D'INDY.

Among French composers of to-day M. Paul-Marie-Théodore-Vincent d'Indy (born in Paris, March 27, 1851) stands apart, a singularly noble, self-centred, commanding figure. He has many fervent admirers, and as many detractors: it would be difficult to find any music-lover whom he leaves indifferent—one may even go to the extent of saying that as an artist he inspires the greater part of the critically minded with sympathy and antipathy combined. But his most confirmed adversaries do not grudge him due respect.

Although his activity is manifold, and directed towards technical education and towards the propaganda of æsthetic (but not purely æsthetic) doctrines as well as towards composition, his individuality is, in all its traits, consistent enough to be studied as a whole. Indeed, if any distinction is necessary, it should be between M. Vincent d'Indy and certain of his surrounders or followers (musicians or writers) who have not a little contributed to exaggerate the consequences of his doctrines or of the example given by him as a creative artist.

From the outset of his career M. d'Indy's sole ambition has been to follow the steps of César Franck, his beloved master, as well as to glorify him by word and deed. Whether his conception of César Franck's art and of the lesson inculcated by the master's works is entirely accurate shall not be discussed here. Briefly summed up, it may be said to consist in the following assertions:

'César Franck is the one great heir and continuer of Beethoven. He has been the first to discern and to carry further the main principles disclosed to the world by Beethoven in his most sublime masterpieces, and especially in those of the last period. We are indebted to him for the extension to "cyclic" or thematic unity of instrumental forms, and also for novel, more penetrating modes of development. His innovations carry with them not only greater logic in structure, but truer and more powerful utterance of all the expressive substance of motives.'*

Therefore M. Vincent d'Indy applied himself to conform to César Franck's example as fully as was compatible with his own temperament; and he has carried out his plan with the uncommon will-power that is perhaps his most striking idiosyncrasy. But in making this remark, one must emphasise the differences between his artistic individuality and César Franck's. He has nothing of César Franck's simplicity and dreaminess, nothing of his lofty, at times visionary and romantic ideality, none of his hesitations or doubts.

'Clearness,' M. Romain Rolland aptly remarks in an essay on M. Vincent d'Indy,† 'is the very essence of his mind. There are no shadows in him. His art, his intellect, are as clear as his eyes, which lend so great juvenility to his physiognomy. And this thirst for clearness is the principal law of his nature as an artist—a fact all the more remarkable on account of his nature being far from simple.'

On the other hand, he is gifted with a keen instinct for the picturesque and even for the pictorial, a taste for tangibly beautiful effects, which remained foreign to César Franck. This instinct and taste, however, he asserts but in a part of his output, and mostly in early works like the 'Symphonie sur un thème Montagnard français' (for orchestra and pianoforte, Op. 25, 1886), which is so admirable that it finds grace even before M. d'Indy's most uncompromising detractors; whereas in the later output of similar category, such as, for instance, the 'Jour d'été dans la montagne' (for orchestra, Op. 61, 1905), he qualifies it with a marked inclination towards abstractedness.

In fact, the history of M. Vincent d'Indy's evolution as a composer is that of a long contest between the abstract and the concrete in musical imagination, each principle gaining the upper hand in turn until the comparatively recent period when abstractedness—apparently owing to the relentless exercise in that direction of the composer's will-power—began to prevail alone (second Symphony in B flat, Op. 57, 1903; Violin and Pianoforte sonatas, Op. 59 and 63, 1904-1907). Almost simultaneously with the first Symphony, the 'Poème des Montagnes' for pianoforte (Op. 15, 1881), the 'Chant de la Cloche' (Op. 18, 1883; a superb 'dramatic legend' which won the city of Paris prize in 1885), he composed chamber-music in an absolutely different and far more formalistic style (Quartettes, Op. 7 and 35, Trio, Op. 29, &c.). But it is especially after the foundation, in 1896, of the 'Schola Cantorum,' the practical school of music intended to oppose the official Conservatoire (at that time under the superintendence of M. Théodore Dubois) and to promulgate the doctrines of Franckism, that he began to devote himself sedulously to teaching and that the change alluded to became altogether manifest.

M. Romain Rolland has accurately defined the spirit of M. d'Indy as an educator in the following lines, which refer to the 'Traité de composition': 'In this remarkable book are welded live science and a Gothic spirit—the word "Gothic" being used in its highest acceptation. Here faith is all, the principle and the end, inspiring the genius, fecundating the thought, conducting the labour, even ruling the style and, as we learn from a strange and lofty page, the very modulations of the musician . . . By a certain scholastic spirit of abstraction and classification, the book again seems to belong to the Middle Ages, and also by its

* See M. Vincent d'Indy's 'Traité de composition musicale,' 'César Franck,' and 'Beethoven.' This view of his has lately been controverted, not only in Germany (a very 'anti-Franckist' country), but also in France. A few months ago, M. Ravel went to the extent of writing that the structure of Franck's Symphony was uninteresting and rudimentary, thereby causing great scandal in 'Franckist' circles.

† 'Musiciens d'aujourd'hui.' Paris, 1908.

extraordinary spirit of symbolism. Above all, M. d'Indy is gifted with the moral qualities that befit the educator. He religiously believes that the absolute duty of art is to instruct humanity. One cannot speak too highly of his disinterestedness, of his devotion to the welfare of art.'

Alone, the religious philosophy of M. Vincent d'Indy and the unusual mixture of moral and of æsthetic conceptions noticeable in his artistic creed account for certain of his tendencies both as a composer and as a teacher or critic. For instance, the importance he ascribes to the symbolic undercurrents of musical style and musical architecture helps us to understand how he has by degrees come to make light of the more physical elements of musical beauty, and to develop his intellectuality at the expense of certain of his artistic instincts.

It has been said that his doctrines and teaching have done much harm to modern French music; and facts may be found that appear to support this assertion to a certain extent. But in no case should M. Vincent d'Indy be held positively responsible. Personally, he is of a very liberal turn of mind; and though he never deviates from his path, he has often shown himself capable of appreciating forms of art as different from his ideals as, for instance, Moussorgsky's, or M. Debussy's, or M. Maurice Ravel's. And he has never attempted to smother the individuality of any of his pupils. The fault lies entirely with those of his followers who misapply his precepts. Also, it is but fair to remark that his teaching can be dangerous to weaklings only; to would-be composers who, if educated elsewhere, would have imitated the mannerisms of Massenet or of M. Charpentier as candidly as, after having followed the courses of composition at the Schola Cantorum, they labour to construct Sonatas, Quartettes, and Symphonies after the approved 'cyclic' formulas. Truly, Parisian concert-goers have during the past years suffered much through the invasion of mechanically turned-out works of immature disciples, works in which colourless themes, derived from the unavoidable 'nucleus' are spun out, dislocated, and superimposed or otherwise maltreated with a vengeance. Truly again, many admirers of M. Vincent d'Indy's dramatic and earlier symphonic scores may find little that satisfies them in the second Symphony or in the Sonatas. But it is not by the mistakes of inexpert pupils that M. d'Indy's teaching should be judged: any gifted young musician will derive many advantages from his guidance; and among those who after learning their craft with him have successfully asserted individuality, it is enough to name MM. de Séverac and Albert Roussel, both of whom rank among the foremost of the younger generation. As for the later compositions, they have been spoken of very highly by more than one excellent judge.

A description of M. d'Indy's activity can be attempted but quite summarily within the scope of a mere article. As a composer he has produced works of every description, from the short song or pianoforte piece to the lyric-drama and religious music, but only a small number in each category. He is now engaged on a great oratorio, 'Saint Christophe.' He has transcribed or edited a tolerably great quantity of ancient music, popular songs, &c., and written, besides the books named above, critical and other essays or articles. He helped Charles Lamoureux to produce 'Lohengrin' in Paris in the memorable year 1887, when a few anti-Wagnerian 'patriots' tried to stir the public sentiment against the production, and succeeded in fomenting riots around the theatre. He has done much as a conductor in France, America, Russia, Holland, Italy, and Spain, and for many years presided over the Société Nationale de Musique. He is Officer of the Legion of Honour, Chevalier of the Belgian Order of Leopold, and Commander of the Order of Charles III. of Spain, member of the Belgian Institute of the Fine Arts, and of several other Art Societies or Institutes, French or foreign.

Recently, his name having been mentioned among the candidates to the succession of Massenet, at the Académie des Beaux-Arts, he wrote to the editor of the paper in which the reference had appeared the following lines:

'I am not and I shall not be candidate, for many reasons which it would be useless to explain here, but the principal of which is that with my very busy life it would be impossible for me to find time, not only for the sittings if by chance I came to be elected, but even for the preliminary round of visits. Moreover, there are so many musicians whom this distinction will please more than it would me. . . .'

Among the many charges brought against him as a composer, some of which pass current, none has been more vehemently asserted than that of Wagnerian imitation. It appears in many of the accounts of 'Fervaal,' and also of 'l'Etranger.' But it is merely a party argument, and does not withstand critical examination. 'Fervaal' is a work remarkable not only for its artistic import, but also for its originality. If it has not yet come to its own, it is not so much on account of opposition, however tenacious, than for the reason that it was produced under inauspicious circumstances, at the close of the period during which the Opéra-Comique temporarily occupied a building larger than the present theatre, which proved unfit for the continuance of the performances (1898). It is to be revived shortly at the Grand-Opéra, and will probably thrive.

'L'Etranger,' also a work of great, though more recondite, beauty, was, contrarily to 'Fervaal,' intended for a moderately large stage; and it happened to be produced, not at the Opéra-Comique, but at the Grand-Opéra. Whether the unpropitious conditions shortened its career, and whether the judgment of the public will in time be reversed, are questions on which opinions differ. Many consider both works as admirable, and are convinced that they will endure, as the 'Chant de la Cloche' and, in the domain of instrumental music, the first Symphony, one of the greatest works of the modern French school.

A CANADIAN MUSICIAN'S 'WANDERJAHR.'

By A. S. Vogt.

Some American and Canadian Universities have established the excellent custom of granting 'Sabbatical' years to members of their various faculties, entitling the recipients to a twelve months' period of combined vacation and study in the Old Lands. It is a matter for regret that some such system is not available for members of the hard-worked musical profession. If musicians would enjoy the delightful and profitable experiences of such a Wanderjahr, they are, of necessity, compelled to exercise personal initiative, and assume the responsibility which such a proposition involves; but the profitable inspiration and pleasure resulting therefrom would seem to justify any reasonable sacrifice in order to realise them. At the kind suggestion of the Editor of the Musical Times, I shall endeavour to record some musical impressions formed during recent travels in various parts of the Continent and in England, confining myself more particularly to choral experiences in France, Austria, Germany, and the Motherland.

I may say in passing that the cultivation of music in Canada is, owing to our close proximity to the powerful and wealthy country to the south of us, affected to some extent by the same cosmopolitan influences which, in so short a period of time, have produced such excellent results in the large Eastern cities of the United States, notably in Boston and New York. In choral music our English extraction has been largely responsible for the remarkable activity which prevails in the city of Toronto in this branch of the art. We have a veritable plethora of choral Societies, all doing their share in inspiring a love of music in a singularly large portion of the city's population. In instrumental music, also, there is an equally active condition of affairs. The city possesses a number of strongly equipped music schools, one of which registered over 2,000 pupils last season. A permanent symphony orchestra and a number of chamber-music organizations combine to enhance the city's reputation as a music-loving and music-supporting community.

Leaving Canada in April last, it was my good fortune to be present at the International Festival held in Paris, in May, at which about 180 of the best choirs of the Continent and England competed. No better opportunity could have been afforded for studying certain choral conditions of the Old World than was presented on this occasion. It was soon made clear that French and British choral ideals were as far removed from each other as the Poles. In the principal competition for mixed-voice choirs, for instance, first honours were awarded a Belgian choir which, on account of fundamental tonal shortcomings and very faulty intonation, would in all probability hardly have been considered a serious factor in a competition presided over by a British board of adjudicators, or even by an International group of judges. The relative positions of the British prize-winning choirs in this class would, apart from the foreign choirs, also doubtless have been changed had the adjudicating been done by English musicians. At the same time one was forced to the conclusion that the British choirs competing, whilst excelling in smoothness and roundness of tone, failed in certain interpretative qualities which the French judges evidently deemed absolutely essential to any performance aspiring to serious artistic recognition. Temperamentally, but more particularly in the subtler elements of rhythm and tonal colour, several of the foreign choirs achieved quite extraordinary results. Perhaps the most notable choral achievement of the Festival was the really superb singing of the Prague Société des Instituteurs-Chanteurs, a men's chorus which, more than any other I heard, seemed to reveal most exhilarating rhythmical abandon and nuancing, combined with an almost orchestral command of colour and a warm and in most cases pure quality of tone. Doubtless almost the entire success won by this remarkably effective body of singers was due to the powerful inspiration gained from their very gifted conductor. I felt convinced at the time that in his hands one or two of the resonant, rich-toned British choirs present would soon have developed a vital and convincing style quite equal to that revealed in the singing of the Bohemian choir under Professor Spilka. This choir I am hoping to hear again, in Prague, before returning to Canada.

The Vienna Music Festival of last June provided rare opportunities for hearing a number of the leading choral bodies of the Austrian capital, including the famous Wiener Männergesangverein and the very efficient mixed-voiced Imperial Society of Music Friends. Both organizations impressed me as combining good tonal resources with sound musicianship.

In Germany my most pleasant choral sensations thus far have been those experienced through the remarkably fine singing of the choirs of St. Thomas' Church, Leipsic, and the Dom Kirche, Berlin. Church music in Germany does not, generally speaking, reach a high standard. But the two choirs named are certainly amongst the finest of their kind in the world. The splendid singing of the exacting programme chosen by the Berlin Domchor for their Russian tour of October furnished a remarkable tribute to the artistic qualifications of their choirmaster, Professor Rüdel, a cultured musician whose choral activities include the training of the Bayreuth Festival chorus and the fine chorus of the Berlin Royal Opera. Some years ago, whilst on a visit to Germany, I was so fortunate as to hear the then touring Russian Imperial Choir, a famous body of singers remarkable more particularly for the phenomenal range and quality of its bass voices. Its répertoire much resembled that of the two representative German church choirs referred to. As my itinerary during the next few months includes St. Petersburg, I may then probably hear the Russian choir in some of its home concerts.

Those things which most impress one in a choral sense in travelling through England are the almost uniformly high vocal standard of its church choirs, the enthusiasm, endurance, and loyalty of its Festival choruses, and the inspiring spectacle presented by the multitudes attending such competitive events as the Blackpool Festival. The unusual technical efficiency and smoothness of tone displayed by the London choirs of St. Paul's, Westminster Abbey, Brompton Oratory, Westminster Cathedral, St. Margaret's, and others it has been my privilege to hear, bear eloquent testimony to what is being consistently demanded by England in its ecclesiastical music.

Birmingham Festival of October provided me with my first English Festival experience. Several things profoundly impressed me here—quite apart from the brilliant achievements of the very fine choir which the event called into existence, and the pronounced success won by Sir Edward Elgar in his new work 'We are the Music Makers.' These were the superb quality of the playing of the orchestra under Sir Henry Wood, and the undisputable triumph won by Professor Granville Bantock in the great orchestral novelty of the Festival, his orchestral drama, 'Fifine at the Fair.' One may safely predict that this work is destined to go the round of the great orchestras of the world. The choir appeared to me to be strongest in its altos and basses, the former in particular being most sympathetic and rich in tone-quality.

The sopranos, although quite effective, seemed hardly equal to those of several Yorkshire choirs I have heard, whilst the tenors appeared somewhat hard in tone and slightly throaty in production. To an outsider the official returns of the paid attendance at the Festival proved disappointing. It is possible that the great artistic development which is taking place in British music is doing much to render obsolete the old-time 'Festival,' the very name of which, under present-day musical conditions, quite wrongly suggests a prevailing state of musical starvation. Or may the comparative indifference of the public be ascribed to the rather too solemn general character of the choral music offered at most of these important events?

One of my most memorable musical experiences has been that provided by the recent Blackpool Competitive Festival. I came to England fully prepared for the unbounded enthusiasm and the abundance of talent which this democratic movement revealed on this occasion. The choral-singing was in many instances of a distinctively beautiful character. But even more remarkable seemed the almost sensational singing of some of the children in the solo competitions. When one considers that these and many of the competing choirs are recruited from the artizan classes, and that a number of the conductors are amateurs, the results achieved must be regarded as a triumphant demonstration of the frank love of music which prevails in the North of England and of the fine natural musical instincts of the people. Through these Festivals the most advanced type of choral composition is being accorded a hearing, and our leading choral composers are being encouraged in some of their most daring vocal and harmonic experiments. One was deeply impressed with what was achieved under the circumstances with an almost impossible type of choral work by some of the competing organizations.

The committee responsible for the choice of suitable tests for the more significant competitions are clearly faced with most perplexing problems. Some of the really brilliant choirmasters whom this unique movement has 'discovered' doubtless welcome works of pronounced complexity, such as are calculated to call for the last ounce of concentration, whether as regards unanchored tonalities, vocal (or unvocal) difficulties, subtle interpretations, or exacting technical details. Yet it cannot be denied that one or two of the chosen tests made demands on musical sensibility, technique, imagination, and general responsiveness apparently quite beyond the range of even the finest competing choirs.

Following a cultivation of the superb unaccompanied choruses of Cornelius, Brahms, and others in former seasons, some of the works chosen for this year's competitions have doubtless seemed to many to be but a logical evolution. Others have felt that some of the test-pieces have clearly proven that the human voice has its limitations. The same may be said of the powers of musical comprehension of the competitors.

The competitions, however, through their artistic triumphs and their devotion to the highest ideals, have been the means of discovering and introducing to the English-speaking choral world some of the most distinctively beautiful and elevating a cappella compositions in the entire repertory of choral music. It would be difficult to estimate the beneficent influence of this significant and wholesome movement on the musical life of the nation; and it may be taken for granted that the same minds which have in the past been responsible for the welfare of these North of England Festivals will successfully grapple with new situations as they are created from time to time as the movement develops.

I cannot conclude this letter without gratefully acknowledging many delightful and unexpected courtesies extended to me by members of the profession and others since my arrival in England. Greatly interested as I have naturally been in what I was privileged to hear musically, nothing has more impressed me than the splendid virility, sincerity, and buoyant spirit of the people of England. Surely there is no occasion here for pessimism either as regards 'decadence of the race' or the artistic future of the nation.

RELIGIOUS SONGS OF THE CAUCASUS.

By Eugénie Lineff.

[At the International Musical Congress held in London last year, Madame Eugénie Lineff, Kuskovo-Tchouchlinka, near Moscow, teacher of singing, and a well-known folk-song collector, read a paper, the full title of which is 'Psalms and Religious Songs of the Russian Sectarians in the Caucasus.' The investigations she made in the sacred folk-music of the Molokans (Tiflis), the Doochobors, and the Community of New Israel were undertaken as a commission from the Imperial Academy of Science and the Russian Geographical Society. We give here only the section referring to the Doochobors. The other sections are printed (in English) in the report of the Congress recently published by Messrs. Novello & Co.]

A Group of Doochobors.

THE DOOCHOBORS.

After a hundred miles of beautiful mountain scenery from Borjom, near Tiflis, to Achalkalaki, the aspect of the road from the latter to Doochoborie changes suddenly. There is not a trace of tree or shrub to be seen. In many places along the brooks and small rivers which intersect the plain in several directions masses of stone, thrown as if by a giant hand, call to mind the legend of the devil scattering in his wrath stones and mountains upon earth. The desolate nature of the place shows into what a desert the Doochobors were banished for their persistence in following the precept of the Bible, 'Thou shalt not kill,' because this was the principal reason of their banishment. The word 'Doochobor' means 'spirit-wrestler.' The Doochobors refuse to serve as soldiers, but as Russia has general conscription every young man is called on to serve his term of soldiership.

In Doochoborie I put up in the village of Orlovka. It is a large hamlet of wide streets, with low stone houses under flat roofs covered with green grass. The enclosures of the court-yards are also of stone. There is not a single tree or bush in the whole place. In the middle of Orlovka there is a large two-storied house with a red, iron-covered roof, belonging to P. P. Verigin, son of the well-known leader of the Doochobors in Canada, P. V. Verigin. When we arrived at the house of Verigin the master happened to be away. I was admitted to a neat, sunny room of faultless cleanliness. The painted floor shone like a mirror. A carved bedstead, with snow-white blankets, stood in one corner of the room. A goodly heap of cushions with lace covers gave it an elegant appearance; the furniture was substantial and comfortable. Verigin's mother, to whom I presented letters written by mutual friends, received me very kindly and made me welcome.

The Doochobors make a very agreeable impression—tall men with thoughtful faces, kind eyes, and quiet manners. Doochobor women wear bright-coloured dresses and embroidery on their black velvet jackets, similar to those worn by women of Little Russia. The men wear half cosack and half Little Russia costume, with a military-looking cap. In comparison with the natives, Armenians and Tartars, who dress in machine-made stuffs of dark colours, the Doochobors in their hand-made clothes and white shirts with coloured embroidery have a joyful, holiday appearance, in spite of their sunburnt faces and hardened hands, which tell of constant work and daily struggle with the severe climatic conditions. During the three summer months they have to sow and to reap their harvest, as very often cold fogs and frosts destroy the crops. In this part of the Caucasus—the (Mokrie Gory) 'Wet Mountains'—only oats and barley can ripen, wheat but occasionally. By the time the crops are cut near Achaltsich, they are still quite green in Doochoborie, and not above one foot high. This peculiarity of the climate will be better understood when we remember that Doochoborie is part of a plateau nearly 7,000 feet above the level of the sea. Their wonderful capacity for work, and especially their perfect communal organization, allow the Doochobors to live well, never knowing want. The poorest among them possess not less than two cows, but many have fourteen or sixteen, and as many horses. They sell horses and cattle, and supply milk to the rich Armenian cheese-makers. The Doochobors never lose heart. Banishment and all sorts of persecution they accept as necessary means for spreading their ideas. Conviction gives them strength to suffer.

I arrived at Orlovka on the eve of the principal festival of the Doochobors, which took place on June 29, the day of St. Peter and Paul. It was the name-day of Peter Verigin, and the commemoration-day of the refusal of this sect to serve in the army, and of the burning of weapons by the Doochobor soldiers, an act for which they had to suffer so much afterwards. Early in the morning, the majority of the population of the four hamlets—Orlovka, Bogdanovka, Efimovka, and Tambovka—started in their furgons (large vans drawn by two horses) in holiday attire, singing psalms. The procession made its way to the sacred cave, where Lukeria Vassilievna Kalmikova, for a long time a leader of the Doochobors, had passed her days of religious meditation. Her memory is revered, as all her life was given up for the good of the Doochobors. The surroundings of the sacred cave are wild but picturesque. A small brook runs near the rocky mountain in which the 'cave' is fashioned. Masses of stone are thrown everywhere, and the whole is covered with patches of long grass and flowers.

During the festival I saw for the first time the ceremony of brotherly kissing—a custom which is repeated by the Doochobors at every prayer or service, in imitation of the ancient Christians. The singing began with 'the eight beatitudes.' An elderly woman with a strong voice commenced the verse with deep feeling, and then it was taken up by the whole congregation. The strict singing, the earnest faces, the peculiar impassioned steadiness of a deep religious sentiment, made an impression not to be resisted. Sometimes one could hear sobs in the vibrating sounds of the melody. Yet a hidden power was also felt in the tune. When the prayer was over the people began to move. The whole mass divided into two rows, men and women opposite each other. A new psalm was started, and the ceremony of kissing began. The first two men of the row grasped each other's hands as a token of spiritual bond, and, having shaken hands three times, gave each other a brotherly kiss; then they bowed to one another, and made a bow to the women standing opposite. The next pair did the same, and so they continued to the last pair of the row. Then the women proceeded and performed the same ceremony throughout. During the ceremony the singing of psalms was continued by the whole community; when it was over, the ground was covered with beautiful white felts brought from the furgons, and several pieces of hand-made linen cloth were spread over them. Plates and eatables were brought out and put on the improvised tables, and a good many samovars appeared. Tea was now poured out, upon which an elder intoned a psalm, and the whole community took it up. Thus the meal began.

On our way to the sacred cave in the morning, the young people who drove us in their van had sung chants and psalms. The same was done when we returned to Orlovka. It was arranged that the next day we should begin to record the psalms. When, however, on the following day I went in the evening to the appointed house, I guessed by the altered disposition of the singers, the host, and the crowds in the streets, that something had happened. It appeared that several elders did not approve of the recording of their psalms by the phonograph, and the young people, in spite of their desire to sing, did not feel inclined to oppose the wishes of the elders. So the recording could not take place. All next day passed in negotiations and doubts. The singers were anxious to have their songs recorded, the elders obstinately withheld their consent. At one time I thought that all my journey from Moscow (over 2,000 miles one way) would come to nothing with regard to the Doochobors' singing; but as luck would have it, the chief, P. P. Verigin, arrived during the night. After my explanation he took great interest in my idea, persuaded the elders to give their consent, helped me in every possible way to do my work, and sang himself with the best group of singers. The woodcut 'H' now exhibited [not here reproduced] shows Verigin's family in a group. The psalms were so long that several cylinders were required to record one psalm, so that I had to get another phonograph to do the recording without interruption. In all I recorded about thirty psalms and chants of Doochoboria.

The Doochobor psalms, which are based on the Gospels, are exceedingly interesting by virtue of their melodic and polyphonic construction. Moreover they are of a sombre character compared with the singing of the Molokans. The melody of the Doochobor psalms does not flow like the melody of a folk-song or like a Molokan tune.

Owing to the slowness of the tempo, the custom of the Doochobor singers is to spread one syllable over several sounds, and to give a peculiar accentuation to the most expressive words. This is done by the Doochobors very forcibly. The performance rises from piano to an immense crescendo, as the singing of the psalm progresses. The text of the Doochobor psalms is only partly taken from Holy Scripture. Their psalms are composed by several generations of Doochobors, and are sung from memory; no written or printed copies were allowed up to the present century. Their life, full of persecution, is reflected in the sombre character of their singing. The number of the Doochobor psalms is very great, and reaches, so they say, up to several thousands. New psalms are still composed, as a reflection of various events of their life. This first attempt of recording their psalms by a phonograph must be considered as an introduction to a large work of collecting Doochobor psalms.

As just stated, the Doochobor psalms are exceedingly long, one verse alone taking not less than from two to three cylinders for recording. Consequently, an attempt to present a Doochobor psalm in a short paper like the present appears impracticable. As an example of Doochobor singing can be given the music of a quasi-religious chant (No. 4) to the words:

'Are ye doves, are ye the grey ones?'

A Chant of the Doochobors.—"Are ye Doves?"

Translation.

Are ye doves,
Are ye the grey ones?
We are not doves,
We are not the grey ones.
Are ye swans,
Are ye the white ones?
We are no swans,
We are not the white ones.

We are angels,
We are archangels,
From heaven-land
We are the messengers.
We are sent by the Lord
Over all the world,
All the wide world.

Where did ye fly?
Where did ye pass?
What did ye see,
What have ye heard?
We have seen,
We have heard
How the soul parted with the body,
Parted and took leave.

THE CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN BALAKIREV AND TCHAIKOVSKY.

By M.-D. Calvocoressi.

The Russian composer Serghei Liapounov, the closest friend of Balakirev's later years and his executor, has published the correspondence between this master and Tchaikovsky,* a correspondence that throws full light on a question of deep interest for the history of Russian music, viz., the influence of Balakirev on Tchaikovsky. The letters exchanged between the composers are partly known through publication in Modest Tchaikovsky's 'Life and Letters of P. Tchaikovsky,' which Mrs. Newmarch has translated into English; and so is the fact of Balakirev's influence on a composer whose works are generally contrasted rather than compared with Balakirev's and those of Balakirev's pupils.

It has become a custom to speak of Russian composers of the 19th century as divided in two schools or clans. Critical analysis supports the division to a certain extent. But the reasons for its obtaining currency are mainly the by no means impartial arguments of the partisans of either clan: César Cui's writings, for instance, or Tchaikovsky's; and also the fact that the works of Russian masters of the 'national' school remain practically unknown to the public of the countries in which Tchaikovsky's warmest admirers are to be found.

The correspondence now published shows that Balakirev, the head of that school, exercised on Tchaikovsky a great influence, artistic as well as personal. He alone among all could persuade Tchaikovsky (as M. Liapounov remarks in his most instructive preface) to accept criticism and be guided by it, to the extent of re-casting or even destroying a work. And though Tchaikovsky has elsewhere expressed himself on Balakirev and his friends in quite another tone, there is no reason to doubt the sincerity of his professions of respect.

The correspondence begins with a semi-official letter (of January, 1868) which Tchaikovsky writes to Balakirev, then conductor of the Symphony Concerts of the Petersburg Conservatoire. Tchaikovsky sends a work of his, asking Balakirev for 'a word of encouragement.' Balakirev answers:

> I should think that in your case a word of encouragement would be not only unbefitting, but unfair. Encouragement is intended for infants only, and your score shows you are a mature artist, whose work calls for severe criticism and not encouragement.

Despite this stern beginning, the correspondence soon became friendly, and Balakirev gave Tchaikovsky, unsparingly, not only criticism and advice, but occasional encouragement.

Towards the end of February, 1869, we find Tchaikovsky sending to Balakirev his Fantasy 'Fatum,' with the hope that he will see a possibility of having the work performed at Petersburg. He would like, says he, to inscribe it to Balakirev, but not without knowing what Balakirev thinks of it.

Balakirev promised to perform 'Fatum' whether he liked the music or not, and accepted the dedication, 'which he treasured as a tangible sign of Tchaikovsky's intangible sympathy.'

In the following letter, Tchaikovsky suggests a few changes in some parts of the work that proved, when the first performance took place at Moscow, to be 'unsatisfactory as music, and also on account of the instrumentation.'

According to Balakirev's promise, 'Fatum' was performed at a concert of the Imperial Russian Musical Society, on March 17/30.

Besides giving Tchaikovsky an account of the performance, and of the way in which the work was received (it had interested Stassov, Cui had found the Andante pleasing and 'quite in the manner of Gounod,' the orchestration had been commended by all), Balakirev, with his customary frankness, wrote for Tchaikovsky the following criticism:

> Petersburg, March 18, 1869.
> I am very fond of you, and therefore shall express my mind without hesitation. Frankly, Laroche in his article has been too lenient towards you. This, in my opinion, is not a composition, but the plan of a composition. You have actually composed one thing only: the motive of the Andante A flat major, which is scarcely passable. The melody is commonplace, colourless; and though it is not altogether devoid of beauty, you have expressed nothing warm, nothing your own, and proceeding from your inmost soul. You have but repeated what has been said long ago, and is practised, to little purpose, in the German musical 'ménagerie.' Cui in one of his articles said that probably an American will invent a machine for turning out Italian operas, and I do not doubt that subsequently a machine will be invented that will turn out new German symphonies in the style of Max Bruch, Raff, Reinecke, and others.
> One does not see your work to have been heartfelt, or matured. . . .

On second thought, Balakirev did not send this letter, but wrote (March 31) another, in which the same criticisms were expressed in milder and briefer terms.*

Tchaikovsky's answer (May 3) was:

> I absolutely agree with all your remarks on my cuisine, but I must say that I should have been altogether happy had you but found some little thing to praise, however slightly. Your letter contains nothing but censure—just, it is true: not an atom of gilding on the pill.
> I acknowledge that your answer did not delight me, but I was not offended in the least, and I heartily render honour to that sincerity and frankness that are one of the most lovable traits of your individuality as a musician.
> The dedication to you, of course, remains; but I hope at some time to write for you something better. . . .

Balakirev's criticism prompted Tchaikovsky to destroy the score of 'Fatum,' which was reconstituted after the author's death from the preserved orchestral parts.

The following work by Tchaikovsky to which the correspondence refers is the 'Romeo and Juliet' Overture; it had been planned and discussed during the summer of 1869, on the occasion of Balakirev's coming to Moscow.† On October 2,

* Petersburg: J. H. Zimmermann. Thanks are due to Messrs. Liapounov & Zimmermann for permission to publish the extracts used in this article.

* To be found in 'Life and Letters of Tchaikovsky.'

† 'Balakirev is living here just now, and I must say his presence wearies me: he insists upon my remaining with him all day long, and that annoys me. He is an excellent man, and kindly disposed towards me, but somehow I cannot feel my soul in unison with his.' (Letter to A. Tchaikovsky, August 3, 1869.)

Tchaikovsky declares that he is all intent on composing the work. Part of Balakirev's answer in which he exemplifies his own methods of composition by telling Tchaikovsky how he wrote the 'King Lear' Overture, is printed in Tchaikovsky's 'Life and Letters.' On October 28 Tchaikovsky writes:

My Overture is advancing pretty fast: the greater part is already quite planned, and I hope to have finished, if nothing prevents me, in about a month and a half. When I launch it into the world, you will see that as it stands—and principally on account of your advice—it has been made according to your suggestions. First, the plan is yours: Introduction, representing the Friar, the broil—Allegro and love—second motive. Secondly, the modulations are yours: Introduction in E major, Allegro in B minor, and second motive in D flat major. I cannot say at all what in it is passable, and what worse. I have often told you that I cannot adopt an objective attitude towards my progeny. I write as best I can; I find it always difficult to fix my choice upon a musical idea from all those that roam through my head. But as soon as I have chosen one, I grow accustomed to it, to its merits and defects, so that to alter or to re-cast it costs me an incredible amount of labour. By my behaviour to the children of my imagination I resemble a mother who, not being able to change the person of her homely daughter, takes her to the ball just as she is, trying to find charm in her warts and her humped back. I tell you all this for you to understand why I do not intend to send you the Overture in its actual state, and want you to see it when finished. Then, censure it as hard as you choose. I will accept all as a lesson, and in my following work will strive to do better. But should you tear it to pieces now, when all is practically composed though not yet come to light—then I should be disheartened and give it up. From what I write, do not deduce that I expect the Overture to displease you. On the contrary, I cherish the hope to satisfy you at least a little—although God knows that more than once I have noticed that you found unsatisfactory what I found tolerable, and vice-versa.

Balakirev professed himself deeply interested by the news, and insisted upon Tchaikovsky's sending him the sketches, with the promise to express no opinion until the completion of the work (November 12). But on November 17 Tchaikovsky wrote:

You probably will be a little astonished to learn that the Overture is not only finished, but copying, so as to be performed at one of the coming concerts. I will send it to you only if, having heard it, I find at least a modicum of merit in it. At present, as it is finished and not yet performed, I know less than ever what it may be worth: I only know that it is not bad enough for me to fear on its account a humiliation here in Moscow (Moscow the delightful, the imperturbably calm, the slave to various Serovs and Famyntsins!).* I copy for you at the end of my letter the principal motives. Afterwards I shall send a score, copied for you, and of course with the dedication to you.

The work being finished, Balakirev did not refrain from criticising the motives. The first he found feeble and devoid of character. The second motive in D flat major he found beautiful.†

You cannot imagine [wrote Tchaikovsky on December 14] how delighted I was by your kind letter. I had been very much afraid of your severe, though equitable, sentence. I was horrified with my own audacity in attempting to write music to Shakespeare, deplored the attempt, and at times wished to throw my music into the fire. Having read your letter, I have dispelled all such thoughts. And I am so glad that even without knowing more, you are sympathetically inclined towards the work dedicated to you.

From a letter begun on March 16, 1870, but found unfinished in Balakirev's papers, it appears that the impression caused by 'Romeo and Juliet' was from the first good, not only on Balakirev, but on his friends:

Illness only prevented my writing to you at once to say how enchanted we all are with your D flat major; Stassov says 'you were five, now you are six.' The beginning and the end, viz., the alpha and omega, are harshly criticised. But I say that they do not call for criticism because you must alter them.

Only in May was Balakirev well enough to write. In the letter sent to Tchaikovsky the same remarks appear almost in the same terms.

Tchaikovsky accepted the advice. On September 6 he wrote:

I do not know whether you will be satisfied, but positively I can do no better. The conclusion I believe to be satisfactory now; the introduction is new; the middle section is almost new, and I have re-cast the scoring of the reappearance of the second motive (in D major).

He received from Balakirev the following lines:

Petersburg, October 19, 1870.

What is the meaning of your not only writing no letter, but also not sending 'Romeo'? If you are too busy to write, simply send the score. I shall copy the parts myself. For a long time we have been waiting impatiently; we are consumed with impatience to know your work in its new form. Especially ardent are Korsinka and Nadéjda Purgold.*

Even in its altered form, 'Romeo and Juliet' did not meet with Balakirev's unqualified approval, although the new version was found by him far superior to the first.†

An ulterior letter from Tchaikovsky tells Balakirev how, Rubinstein having taken away a copy of the score in its first version, 'Romeo' got printed in Berlin without Tchaikovsky's amendments and without the inscription to Balakirev. The ne varietur edition was to appear ten years later in Moscow.

The same year, Balakirev having received from Tchaikovsky for performance a chorus, 'which, with the exception of one trivial melody, pleased him greatly,' made the following suggestion for a choral work:

It would be a pity if your chorus remained without surrounding. It is not fit for an opera. It is too full of lyricism; the public would look at the decoration rather than listen to the music. I propose that you should write a cantata, entitled 'Night,' including several choruses. some of them fantastic: a water-chorus of roussalki (nixes), a chorus of lieshys (forest spirits), and aria of the 'Night,' something like the 'O belle nuit' in Félicien David's 'Le Desert,' a work that I am very fond of, although it is childish). Let it contain an instrumental scherzo, like 'Queen Mab,'‡ inspired from the humming of insects and their nocturnal flight; a ferocious owl sits somewhere, ready to devour them (element of terror); a brook rustles, the glow-worms shine . . .

The cantata should have no actual subject, but remain lyrical and descriptive, so as to be a cantata and not an opera. It might end with a farewell chorus of spirits, taking

* Serov, the composer, and the critic Famyntsin (whose memory is embalmed in Moussorgsky's satiric song 'The Classicist') were the foes of all progressive composers.

† The greater part of that letter is printed in 'Life and Letters of Tchaikovsky.'

leave of each other, at dawn, till the following night (gradually diminuendo). At the end, the orchestra alone depicts the dawn, goes crescendo, light grows brighter and brighter, and the final chords depict, as a conclusion, the sunrise. The cantata might begin by a short orchestral prelude. It would be necessary to keep the whole in a fantastic character. . . . Should you decide to compose the work, do not hurry, do not consider composing it as a task to be ready in a given time, but let all proceed from inspiration and feeling.

Tchaikovsky declared himself delighted with the idea, and promised to profit by it at some later time. The only difficulty he foresaw was in finding a suitable poet.

Shortly after occurs in the correspondence a gap of over ten years—the years during which Balakirev retired from the world and ceased all intercourse even with his most intimate friends. In September, 1881, Tchaikovsky wrote to him a letter, care of Balakirev's publishers, in which he announced the new edition of 'Romeo and Juliet.'

Balakirev's answer reached Tchaikovsky thirteen months later. Balakirev had returned to Petersburg, and lived in Kolomna Street, No. 7 (the house that he occupied until his death):

Your kind letter [wrote Balakirev] and your dedication show that you have not altogether stricken me off the memory of your heart. I should be glad to see you again, and have to offer you the programme of a symphony which you would turn into a beautiful work.

I have of late studied your scores, and naturally enough have rejoiced in seeing the rise and development of your talent. In your two tone-poems, the 'Tempest' and 'Francesca da Rimini,' you rise to your zenith, especially with the latter. . . .

Tchaikovsky answered without delay, in terms of warm respect, gratitude and friendship (which contrast strikingly with the disparaging terms in the paragraph devoted to Balakirev in his famous and often quoted letter to Frau von Meck of December, 1877). He awaits the programme with great expectancy. The programme was that of the 'Manfred' Symphony.* The suggestion did not seem at first sight very satisfactory to Tchaikovsky, who said as much to Balakirev with commendable frankness:

Kamenka, November 12, 1882.

Notwithstanding your having called 'The Tempest' and 'Francesca' the zenith of my art (an opinion with which I absolutely disagree), I for some reason imagined that your programme would awaken in me a burning desire of translating it into music, and I awaited your letter with breathless impatience. But I am disenchanted . . . Your programme—which might help to build an effective symphony in Berlioz's style—leaves me for the present absolutely cold. When heart and fancy are not kindled, is it worth while to start composing? I could, as you say, 'fall to work' and invent a whole series of episodes, with suitably sombre music to depict Manfred's hopeless disenchantment, a wealth of brilliant instrumental effects for the Witch of the Alps, high notes of violins for the sunrise, the death of Manfred to an accompaniment of trombones pianissimo; I could dress these episodes with curious and striking harmonies, and launch the whole upon the world under the sonorous title 'Manfred, symphonie d'après . . .' and so forth. By doing so I might earn praise; but I do not in the least wish to write such a work. Despite my respectable age and my experience, I still struggle through the boundless fields of composition, vainly striving to find my true path. I feel that such a path exists, and I know that when I have found it I shall write something positively good. . . . Occasionally I have come near the 'path'; and then appeared things of which to the end of my life I shall never be ashamed—things that rejoice me and sustain my energy. But this happens seldom, and I do not count among the few exceptions 'Francesca' nor 'The Tempest.' Both these works were written with affected ardour and false pathos, in pursuit of purely exterior effects—they are, in fact, absolutely cold, mendacious, and feeble . . . I forbear to speak of the 'Romeo' Overture—the Lord knows why it has been as exaggeratedly praised as my other works have been exaggeratedly censured. I remember that whilst composing it, deeply moved by your sympathy and interest, I did my best to satisfy you. But even then I realised, with morbid keenness, the absolute lack of connection between Shakespeare's picture of the Italian Romeo's juvenile passions and my sweet-and-sour wails. I do not think in the least that, generally speaking, programme-music à la Berlioz is a spurious genus of art; I simply notice the fact that in that direction I have done nothing remarkable.

It is quite possible that for my hopeless coldness towards your programme the responsible one is Schumann. I am so fond of his 'Manfred,' so accustomed to associate it with Byron's, that I do not see how one could extract from this subject other music than Schumann's.

Two years afterwards Balakirev sent to Tchaikovsky a lengthy, detailed programme for 'Manfred,' couched in Stassov's handwriting, with musical hints in his own: 'Symphony in B flat minor, without B major; second motive in D major, and repeated in D flat major, &c.' He adds the following curious list of 'auxiliary material':

For the first and last Sections:

'Francesca da Rimini'	Tchaikovsky
'Hamlet'	Liszt
Finale of 'Harold'	Berlioz
Prelude { E minor ... ... / E flat minor ... ... / C sharp minor, No. 25 ... (published separately).	Chopin

For the Larghetto:

Adagio of the 'Symphonie Fantastique'	Berlioz

For the Scherzo:

'La Reine Mab'	Berlioz
Scherzo (B minor) of the third Symphony	Tchaikovsky

On the following day (October 31, 1884) Tchaikovsky wrote that a dear friend of his was dying of consumption in Switzerland, and that he intended to depart for Davos without delay. The following lines of this letter are well worth quoting:

I was deeply moved by our conversation of yesterday. How good you are! How truly you are my friend! And how I wish that the enlightenment that reigns in your soul would descend in mine! I may say in absolute truth that more than ever I thirst for solace and comfort in Christ. I shall pray that faith in Him may grow still stronger in my soul.

From Paris (December 1/13, 1884) Tchaikovsky, fresh from his visit to the Alps, writes that he is constantly thinking of 'Manfred.' Nine months later the work was completed:

I am afraid [wrote Tchaikovsky on September 13, 1885] that you will be displeased with my having written it so quickly. But such I am, and such I must remain. . . . Believe me, never in my life did I write with so little effort and so little fatigue.

It appears that to the composer Serghei Tanéïèv, Tchaikovsky had declared himself displeased with the task of writing 'Manfred,' which he accomplished, he said, only from a sense of duty,

* The letter in which Balakirev propounded it is printed in 'Life and Letters of Tchaikovsky.'

having made the promise. But to Frau von Meck, on the very day when he wrote to Tanéïèv in such terms, he said he was 'so much in love with "Manfred" that his new opera would for a long time remain in the background.'

We find him at some pains to dispel from Balakirev's mind the effects of Tanéïèv's having made public these private views of his:

After a period of doubts [he repeats] I felt deeply attracted by the subject, and never did I find greater pleasure in my work.

Six months later he could confidently assert:

Although some of my friends say that in 'Manfred' I am not myself, I think the work my best in the way of orchestral music.

The cantata, 'The Night,' was never written. The correspondence continues until the end of 1891, at irregular intervals, but contains nothing of actual musical interest.

Occasional Notes.

Had the late Mr. Wilhelm Kuhe's life been only a little prolonged he might have at last seen a successful attempt to restore Brighton to the position of musical prominence in which Mr. Kuhe's own energies once placed it. On November 12 commences the Brighton Musical Festival, given under the auspices of the Municipality, with the Municipal Choir and Orchestra of 450 performers. The programmes of the six concerts (on November 12, 13, 14, 15 in the evening, and on November 16 in the afternoon and evening) are likely to make a popular appeal, and illustrate, in company with the programme of the Bristol Festival, the modern tendency towards dramatic music. They consist of 'Samson and Delilah' and 'Carmen' (both complete), a Wagner programme, Berlioz's 'Faust,' Elgar's 'The Music Makers,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' and miscellaneous numbers. The conductor-in-chief is Mr. Lyell-Tayler. The Wagner selections, however, will be conducted by Sir Henry J. Wood, 'The Music Makers' by the composer; Sir A. Mackenzie, Mr. Edward German, and Dr. A. King will also direct performances of their own works, and Mr. Robert Taylor that of Gounod's 'Gallia.' Now we shall know whether a Festival can succeed without either 'Elijah' or 'The Messiah.'

Operatic performances in Manchester invariably bring forth notable critical writing in the Manchester Guardian. For instance, apropos the recent Quinlan performance of 'Die Walküre,' 'H. S.' wrote:

Wotan is too often a platform singer in an eccentric costume. Mr. Parker made him as human as Homer's Zeus; he is the Hyperion not sunk in reflective melancholy but still fighting hard against the new dynasty of gods. Many people, like ourselves, would revise their opinion of the Wotan scenes in the Ring after last night. To us they have often seemed a proof of the prolixity and dull systematisation which beset the German genius even at its best and greatest, unwilling to let well alone, or to leave unsaid anything that might be said, sowing with the whole sack at once, straining every sentiment to the last drop of exhaustion, hammering at its points until it splits the board, always explicit, never content to suggest. But in truth Wotan, not Siegmund, is the real hero of the 'Valkyrie.' One could no more do without him in the Ring than without a plot in Greek drama. His are the eternal woes against which the lyricism of the orchestra and of the humans surges and beats like the choruses in Greek tragedy against the solid iambics. Without Wotan, the Ring is a symphonic-poem for orchestra with vocal obbligato. He is the necessary link between the lyrics and the drama of the Ring.

We have long envied the leisurely, old-world manner in which the cognoscenti of some provincial cities take their musical enjoyment, drawing the full flavour of every sip and smacking their lips over it. Music in London is too crowded for this arm-chair contemplation.

The most interesting feature of the present season hitherto has been the formation and appearance of the Beecham Wind Orchestra, or 'London Civil Band,' under the conductorship of Mr. Emile Gilmer. It is the outcome of a desire on Mr. Beecham's part to arrest the alleged decline of English wind playing, and to explore new sources of tone-colour. The constitution of the band or orchestra is as follows (we are indebted to the Standard for the list):

Two piccolos.	One cornet à pistons in E flat.
Two flutes.	Two cornets à pistons in B flat.
Two oboes.	One bass trumpet.
One bass oboe.	Four French horns.
One heckelphone.	One alto trombone.
One English horn.	One tenor trombone.
Two clarinets in E flat.	One bass trombone.
Eight clarinets in B flat.	One tuba in F.
Two basset horns.	One tuba in E flat.
Two bass clarinets.	One contra-bass tuba in B flat.
Two bassoons.	One celesta.
One sarrusophone in B flat.	One kettle-drum.
One sarrusophone in C.	One side drum.
One soprano saxophone.	One bass drum and cymbals.
One alto saxophone.	One harp.
One tenor saxophone.
One baritone saxophone.
Two trumpets.

The scheme has not only been formulated but has been carried to completion, and, we understand, tested in public. Familiar music has been arranged for the 'wind orchestra,' and composers of repute have been asked to write new music for it. Once more we are in debt to the enterprise of Mr. Thomas Beecham, who has the brain to conceive original plans, and the energy and other essential means to fulfil them.

In our September number (p. 577) we reproduced the argument of two French operas which had been done into English by a German writer. Below we give a Frenchman's English version of the plot of a French opera. This appeared in the programme of the Paris Grand Opéra.

Samson and Dalilah.

Opéra in three Acts.

Music by Camille Saint-Saens.

Samson exercises the magistracy in Israël who is under the Philistines's yoke.

Endowed by supernatural strength he succeeds to rise the hebrews in insurrection against the Philistines, defies the latter's prince Abimelech and kills him near the Philistines's temple.

The high Priest of the philistines's god, Dagon, comes just out of the temple and, seeing the killed prince, curses the hebrews.

But Samson becomes master of the town and spreads terror amongst the philistines.

The high priest wants to know the secret of Samson's supernatural strangth. He finaly finds out that Samson is the lover of a philistine's girl Dalila and promises her riches would she betray her lover.

Dalilah promises to do it and forces Samson to tell her the secret of his supernatural strangth. Samson resists but finaly tells her that his strangth would disappear if he had his hairs cut off.

Dalilah then profits by the sleep of Samson, cut his hairs of and calls the Philistines. Samson, who lost indeed his strangth with his hairs, falls in to the hands of the Philistines who blind him and chaine him up.

The hebrews are captive again. They invoke the God of Israël and reproach Samson to have betrayed them for a woman's sake.

The Philistines in great number are now in their temple to glorify their god Dagon.

The high priest and Dalilah are there surrounded by the Philistine's Princes. Samson is also there to amuse, by his misfortune, the Philistines who laugh about his god of Israël and his love for Dalilah.

The remainder is cast in conventional English.

The recent Birmingham Festival provided much to be thankful for and some short periods of positive distress: brief, relatively, but very acute while they lasted. Has an audience, and especially such an audience as was assembled to hear Handel's 'Messiah,' no rights, no feelings, no judgment worth consideration in the interpretation of a work of this kind? The implication of the extraordinary freedom of the treatment on this occasion of the tempi of some of the Choruses hitherto regarded as amongst the finest exemplifications of Handel's genius is that the composer did not know how to express his ideas. No one has a greater admiration for the work and genius of Sir Henry Wood than ourselves. But this sincere feeling cannot reconcile us to a 'reading' which, so far as we could ascertain, was practically universally condemned.

In our August issue (p. 510) we announced that the Musical League and the Incorporated Society of Musicians would hold a joint series of concerts at Birmingham on the occasion of the annual Conference of the latter body, which is to take place from December 30, 1912, to January 3, 1913. All the programmes have not been definitely settled, but we are glad to be able to say that on Friday afternoon, January 3, at 4.15, a performance of Mr. Granville Bantock's unaccompanied Choral Symphony, 'Atalanta in Calydon,' will be given in the Town Hall by a choir of 400 voices formed from the Liverpool Welsh Choral Union, the Manchester Orpheus Society (Mr. Walter Nesbitt), and the Gitana Ladies' Choir (Madame Maggie Evans), all under the direction of Mr. Harry Evans, of Liverpool. It may be thought that it would have been appropriate to secure Birmingham resources for the performance of the highly novel work of the Birmingham professor. But there was no chance of four hundred singers in that city being able to give the time for the numerous rehearsals the very difficult character of the work demands, whereas the northern combination described has already been closely studying the music for some time past with a view to performance at Manchester and Liverpool. This choir therefore already exists as a highly-trained unit. We feel assured that Birmingham will extend a cordial welcome to outsiders whose only desire is to honour to the utmost of their ability one of Birmingham's foremost citizens.

COLERIDGE-TAYLOR MEMORIAL CONCERT.

Royal Albert Hall, Friday, November 22.

We are glad to announce that a strong committee, under the presidency of the Earl of Pembroke, has been formed to promote the success of the above concert, the proceeds of which will be handed to the wife of the late composer. As stated in our last issue, Coleridge-Taylor died on September 1 at the early age of thirty-seven.

Practically all the well-known leaders of the profession are giving the scheme their support, and Lord Alverstone (the Lord Chief Justice), the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Earl of Plymouth, Sir William Bigge, Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree, Mr. J. Ernest Palmer, Mr. William Boosey, Mr. Arthur Boosey, Mr. H. A. Daniell, Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland, and other noblemen and gentlemen have joined the general committee.

A meeting of the committee was held at Messrs. Novello's, 160, Wardour Street, on October 23. The chair was taken by Colonel H. Walters, V.D., who, with Mr. Julien Henry, initiated the scheme. The committee was influentially represented at the gathering, there being present Sir Hubert Parry, Sir Frederic Cowen, Dr. Alcock, M.V.O., Mr. Curwen, Mr. Ludovic Goetz, Mr. Alfred Littleton, Mr. Augustus Littleton, Dr. McNaught, Mr. Walter Hedgcock, Mr. Arthur Fagge, the Hon. G. W. Spencer Lyttelton, C.B., Mr. Hilton Carter, and many others.

Colonel Walters paid a high tribute to the musical achievements of the late composer, and to his generous, frank nature, which was so aptly described by his friend, Alfred Noyes:

> Generous as a child; so wholly free
> From all base pride that fools forgot his crown.

He (Colonel Walters), knew that sympathy, universal and heartfelt, went out to the widow and little ones in their sad bereavement. He stated that Miss Muriel Foster (Mrs. Goetz), in expressing her regret that she could not assist at the concert owing to a fixed engagement elsewhere, had sent a cheque for twenty guineas. He then detailed the proposed arrangements so far as they had been discussed in order to lay them before the meeting. It was stated that Friday, November 22, was practically the only available date for the concert, if it was to be held at the Royal Albert Hall.

The promise of the cordial co-operation of the Royal Choral Society (Sir Frederick Bridge), the Alexandra Palace Society (Mr. Allen Gill), the Crystal Palace Choir (Mr. Hedgcock), and the London Choral Society (Mr. Arthur Fagge) has been received. The London Symphony Orchestra, the New Symphony Orchestra, the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society, the Handel Society, and the Stock Exchange Orchestral Society, Miss Ruth Vincent, Miss Esta d'Argo, Madame Ada Crossley, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Gervase Elwes, Mr. Robert Radford, and Mr. Julien Henry have also kindly consented to assist.

It is proposed that all the music performed should be selected from Coleridge-Taylor's works. So far as the programme has been settled, it will include the Orchestral Ballade in A minor, two of the 'Characteristic Waltzes,' some of the music to 'Nero,' and most notably the first two sections of 'Hiawatha.'

Colonel Walters, in conclusion, besought the best endeavours of the committee and the large circle of friends and admirers of the late composer to make the occasion a worthy tribute to his memory.

The Earl of Pembroke said he was a great admirer of the works of the late musician, and expressed his entire sympathy with the proposals, which had been placed before them in a business-like manner, and he formally moved that they be adopted. Sir Hubert Parry seconded the resolution, which was carried.

After some answers to inquirers as to details, a small executive committee, consisting of Mr. Alfred Littleton, Mr. Charles Rube, Mr. W. G. Rothery, Mr. Julien Henry, and Colonel Walters, was appointed to carry out the scheme. We wish to add that we trust our readers will find it in their power to support this tribute to a man who has afforded so much delight to his generation. The time to awaken public attention to the project is all too short, and there is therefore all the greater need for immediate action.

Some other particulars are given in our advertisement columns.

WAGNER AND THE WINE-LIST.

AN INCIDENT OF THE ZURICH DAYS.

By R. Gatty.

One of the most interesting results of the recent publication of Wagner's autobiography was an article in the Neue Freie Presse, containing two new letters of the great composer and a circumstantial account of an extraordinary incident at his dinner-table in the Zurich days. Among his associates and admirers of that period was a young Robert von Hornstein, the son of a man of property, who had a common interest with Wagner in the works of Schopenhauer. In 1908 his Memoirs were published by his son, but some correspondence and certain passages were withheld 'out of consideration for Wagner and his family.' As, however, Wagner in his 'Life' calls Hornstein a 'Tölpel' (booby), the son feels impelled, in justice to his father, to disclose the real relationship between the two men in the article in question. First come the suppressed passages from Hornstein's Memoirs, which throw significant light on the estimation in which Wagner was held.

'I must mention that I often expressed my regret to the Ritters [mutual friends of Wagner and Hornstein] that I was not in a position to repay Wagner's hospitality. Each time I got the same answer from Ritter, "Wagner doesn't expect it now. He knows your situation, and will make up for it later on. He's waiting for a more favourable time."' On Hornstein expressing his dislike at this interpretation of Wagner's friendship, Ritter replied, 'Oh, no doubt Wagner likes you and esteems you, but it is too much second nature in him to calculate in this way for him to be capable of making an exception.' Hornstein continues that it was said to be 'Stil' ('the thing') to take a few bottles of wine with one when invited to Wagner's table, although he himself had no occasion to observe the practice. On Wagner's birthday, however, he and a Swiss conductor named Baumgartner were invited, and he was rather surprised to find that they were the only guests. When dessert was reached, Wagner ordered his sister-in-law to bring him the wine-list from a restaurant near by, which she did with some hesitation. Wagner then read out the names of the various brands of champagne with the prices, and finally sent for a bottle of medium quality. The guests felt uncomfortable; however, the bottle was brought and emptied. Then Wagner turned to the pair, 'with a scornful smile playing round his lips,' and said in raised tones, 'Now, shall I perhaps give each of the two gentlemen a thaler as well?' Wagner's wife and sister-in-law fled, and after a moment's embarrassment the two guests turned it off with a laugh. They then took their leave, the ladies failing to reappear, and Hornstein went at once to Ritter and told him the story. Ritter was furious. He felt that something had to be done, and finally decided to send Wagner at once a basket of champagne. Hornstein was doubtful about the device, but Ritter knew his man. Wagner appeared at the Ritters' door soon afterwards with the following excuse. He had not meant his guests but—the German princes. 'They perform my operas, and rave about me. What do I get from it? It doesn't occur to them to send me a basket of wine.' Hornstein adds that Wagner then had to hear some disagreeable home-truths until finally a reconciliation took place between them.

Was Ritter entirely right in his estimate of Wagner's motives? In December, 1861, Wagner wrote as follows to Hornstein, after the latter had succeeded to his estates:

'Dear Hornstein,—I hear you have become rich. How wretched I am you can easily gather from my failures . . . I need the immediate advance of ten thousand francs. . . . To get me this sum will be difficult for you, too; but at any rate it will be possible if you wish, and do not shun sacrifices. This, however, I demand (verlange), and so I ask you for it, with the promise to try similarly in the course of three years to repay you the loan from my receipts. So show that you are the right man! If you are—and why isn't this to be expected from some one some day?—you will then come very close to me through your help, and you must then put up (sich gefallen lassen) with having me for about three months next summer on one of your estates, preferably in the Rhine district. . . . I will only mention that six thousand francs immediately would relieve me considerably. In this case I could arrange not to need the failing four thousand francs before March.'

Hornstein refused, and the following passages from Wagner's reply deserve quotation:

'The case will hardly occur that a man like me will again apply to you. . . . It was not your place to instruct me in any way, not even as to who is really rich. . . . If you are not prepared on any of your estates to receive me, you ought to have seized the complimentary opportunity offered you of immediately taking the necessary steps at the place I wished. To say you will let me know sometime when you are prepared is consequently an insult. . . . Counting on mutual discretion, in the same way that I offer it, Yours sincerely, Richard Wagner.

To this letter Hornstein returned no reply, and further intercourse then ceased between them.

Church and Organ Music.

THE EARLY HARMONIZED CHANTS OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

(Concluded from page 650.)

BY S. ROYLE SHORE.

These chants seem to have reached their climax under Byrd and Gibbons, the latter easily outdistancing everyone else in elaboration. The following composition of Byrd's is very impressive, but it is terribly marred for practical purposes by one of those false relations (at *) in which English composers of the period were accustomed to indulge. In their worst form, as here, they are intolerable, and more trying to the ear than the most advanced modern discord. Perhaps the singers of the period were accustomed to manipulate them. Ex. 20A is a suggestion for choral purposes:

Ex. 20. WILLIAM BYRD (d. 1623). JEBB'S "Choral Responses."

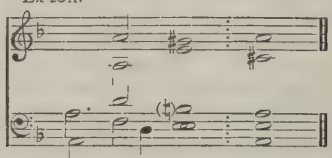
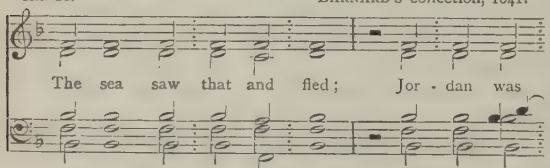
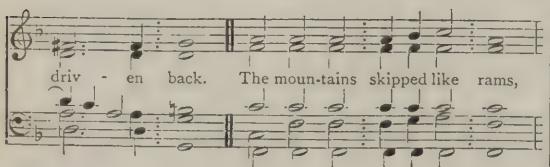
Ex 20A.

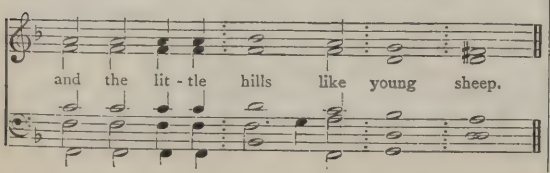


The tradition is that Robinson's chant (1706) is the oldest double chant. This must now yield the palm to one of Byrd's, a century or so earlier, for the following is clearly a double chant, and is sung as such, so the present writer is informed, in Wells Cathedral:

Ex. 21. WILLIAM BYRD. BARNARD'S collection, 1641.







The next example is the first half of another chant of Byrd's, Ex. 22A showing how the composer has elaborated the form when he desired to do a little word-painting in one of the verses. The second half of the chant, which is not given, is apt to become very irritating when repeated several times.

Ex. 22. WILLIAM BYRD. BARNARD'S Collection, 1641.

Ex. 22*a*. Psalm 47, v. 5

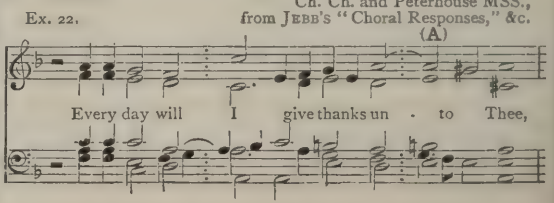
Another chant of Byrd's is perhaps the most noble of any. The psalm is laid out for a solo voice with organ accompaniment in alternation with a chorus. The latter is the Sarum 'Tonus Peregrinus,' which has already appeared in this article, and seems to have been a favourite theme with composers. The melody is in the treble instead of the tenor. This and the independent organ accompaniment suggest a Jacobean date (1603-25). The solo is a free variant of the chant. The organ part is unfortunately lost, unless the Durham MS.—which has already supplied the missing accompaniment to a psalm setting by Gibbons—contains a copy. This antiphonal treatment is in accordance with Continental tradition in the matter of 'Falsibordoni' for the Psalms and Canticles, to which reference has already been made. It was evidently an English pre-Reformation tradition, of which there are post-Reformation traces.

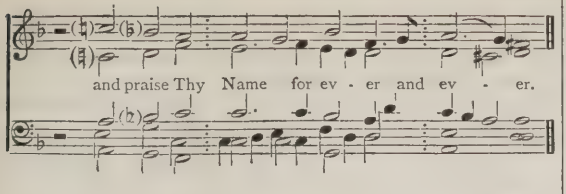
The example is too long to quote; but the chorus is to be reproduced in the settings of the evening Canticles about to be brought out by Novello & Co., referred to earlier in this article.

Many of Orlando Gibbons's psalms are too elaborate to quote, as they require setting out in score. One from Barnard, 'The eyes of all wait upon Thee, O Lord,' has been published as an anthem by Novello & Co., and is the psalm mentioned above, the missing accompaniment to which has been supplied by an old Durham organ book. This setting seems to suggest that Gibbons had some knowledge of the 16th century 'Falsibordoni' of the Continent (see Ex. 5), because he so wonderfully reproduces their spirit in some of the verses.

The following and concluding example is given with some reserve, as the treble part has been lost and has had to be supplied from conjecture by the Rev. W. D. V. Duncombe, Minor Canon and Custos of Hereford Cathedral, in collaboration with the present writer:

Ex. 22. ORLANDO GIBBONS (d. 1625). Ch. Ch. and Peterhouse MSS., from JEBB'S "Choral Responses," &c.





At A is a common and a rather unpleasant progression of the period, resulting from the sounding during a suspension, of the octave of its resolution in the burlesqued form of a false relation. The saving of the fifths by crossing is also noteworthy.

The disuse, with the practical loss of all memory of these interesting chants or settings, was due to the destruction of church music during the Commonwealth, the changed tastes in church music at the Restoration, and the need that choirs should restrict themselves to such chants—like Examples 1 and 4, and the unisonal plain-chant—as could be sung from unpointed Psalters. The Anglican chant, when developed from the foregoing, was thus sung until well on in the last century, as were the old Tones to the Latin Psalter in pre-Reformation times.

This serious loss of tradition was not peculiar to psalm chants, but, as the present writer has shown elsewhere, extended to all the more important and polyphonic forms of Edwardine, Elizabethan, and Jacobean Service, as distinguished from Anthem music. Only the simpler or homophonic forms survived in the cathedral tradition, as evidenced and perpetuated in the 18th-century collections of Boyce and Arnold. This loss is now being repaired in the 'Cathedral Series' about to be published by Novello & Co.

It is hoped that many of the psalm settings will ultimately be printed and included in the above 'Series,' and a collection brought out of the old chants in Anglican chant and extended forms, edited for use with the Cathedral Psalter. In the meantime, the settings to the evening Canticles of some of these chants, now in course of publication by Novello & Co., to which reference has already been made, will bring many of the chants within the reach of everyone, and stimulate practical interest in a subject which is probably new to most church musicians. One of the chants will be sung to a Psalm at each of the week-day evensongs in Birmingham Cathedral during the Musical Festival week.

It should be noted that the words 'call me blessed' in the 'Faux Bourdon' Ex. 5, are differently distributed in the various parts. As printed, only the treble distribution appears.

Messrs. Binns, of Bramley Organ Works, Leeds, have now completed the organ in Tetbury Parish Church, and are to be congratulated upon the artistic manner in which they have carried out the work. In the year 1805 the authorities purchased for £300 the organ erected in the Rotunda of the Ranelagh Gardens, London. This instrument was built by Byfield in 1746, and played upon by Mozart, and was in use until 1862, when an order was placed with Messrs. Nicholson, of Worcester, who erected their organ in the West Gallery of the church. The specification was drawn up by the Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, Bart. In 1901 this organ was re-erected in the south-east angle of the nave, by Messrs. Liddiall & Sons. The present instrument contains most of the old pipe-work, and the skill of Messrs. Binns is well shown in the grouping and voicing. The Swell and Great organs each contain ten stops, the Choir five stops, and the pedal five. There are ten couplers and a tremulant. Mr. F. N. Baxter, the organist of the church, expresses himself as highly pleased with the instrument, which lends itself equally to the purposes of the church services and to recital work.

We are glad to know that Dr. Alcock has recovered from the serious illness which has prevented his undertaking any work for the past three months, and that his health is quite restored.

The organ recently built for the Victoria Street Congregational Church, Jersey, by Messrs. Gray & Davison, was opened on September 26, when a recital was given by Mr. Frederick Attenborough, organist of Burton Parish Church. At the Dedicatory Service, Mr. Ph. Syvret, the organist of the church, presided at the instrument.

We have received programmes of four organ recitals given at St. Saviour's Church, Riga, by Mr. Arthur Shirley, formerly organist of the Parish Church, King's Lynn. We are glad to see that Mr. Shirley gives prominence to the work of English composers, as shown by the inclusion of such names as Peace, Wesley, Calkin, Wolstenholme, Smart, Lemare, Hollins, Harwood, and West, and that he confines his attention almost entirely to pure organ music. At a Harvest Festival, held on September 23, the Anthem was Dr. Cuthbert Harris's 'Sing a song of Praise,' and the remainder of the service music was by Turle, Woodward, Maunder, Greenish, and Naylor.

On September 22, Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson gave his two-hundredth organ recital at the Halifax Place Chapel, Nottingham, when his programme was devoted to compositions by Nottingham organists.

The first meeting of the Glasgow Society of Organists was held at the Athenæum on October 5, when Mr. Alfred Hollins explained the construction of the organ.

The Liverpool and District Organists' and Choirmasters' Association held its monthly meeting at the Common Hall, Liverpool, on Monday, October 7, Mr. C. W. Bridson, of St. Nicholas' Parish Church, Liverpool, in the chair. Dr. A. W. Pollitt, organist of the Church for the Blind, Liverpool, read an interesting paper entitled 'A lesson from the Past for the Future.' The Association now enters upon its fourth session. It has a membership of about seventy, and is doing good work in bringing together the organists and choirmasters of the district. Last season the Society sustained a severe loss in the deeply-regretted death of Dr. A. L. Peace (the Liverpool City Organist), who was the first president, and who took an active interest in all matters connected with the Association.

Mendelssohn's 25th Psalm, 'Come, let us sing,' was sung by the choir of the Nottingham Central Mission, Halifax Place, under the conductorship of Mr. E. M. Barber, on Sunday, September 29. Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson presided at the organ.

Garrett's Harvest Cantata was performed by the choir of Hessle Church, East Yorkshire, at the Harvest Festival, on October 9, under the direction of the organist, Mr. Philip Chignell. This gentleman is fortunate in having the musical assistance of both clergy and churchwardens. The Bishop of Hull (vicar) and the curate (Rev. G. D. Barker) are both admirable singers, and the two churchwardens, Messrs. W. Burwell and W. Coulson, are both regular members of the choir. At the service mentioned, all four officials lent valuable musical assistance.

Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' was given a notable performance by the Chichester Cathedral Oratorio Society at the Cathedral, on October 10, under the able direction of Mr. F. J. W. Crowe. The solo portions were efficiently and expressively sung by Messrs. R. Marley and Wilkins (tenors), and by boys of the choir. Accompaniment was supplied by an orchestra, assisted by Mr. Stephenson, of Birmingham Cathedral, at the organ. The future arrangements of the Society include performances of Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and Bach's 'Sleepers, awake,' in December, and Brahms's 'Requiem' in Lent.

Mr. J. Pryse-Lloyd, son of Mr. E. D. Lloyd, of Bangor, North Wales, has beeen elected to the Tenor Choral Scholarship at King's College, Cambridge. The scholarship is of the value of £80 per annum. He commenced duties on October 16.

Reviews.

The Office of the Holy Communion. Set to music by John Merbecke. Edited, with an accompaniment for organ, by G. C. Martin.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Sir George Martin states that 'this edition of Merbecke's Communion Service is intended chiefly for those choirs which are not familiar with the Plainsong notation.' We have always failed to see the present-day utility of that notation, interesting as it undoubtedly is to the antiquarian. We are not living in mediæval days, and such an edition of Merbecke's strong and healthy music will undoubtedly do much to bring it within the understanding of many choirs which hitherto have been deterred by the Plainsong notation. An interesting feature lies in the fact that the edition of the Credo practically corresponds with that written by Sir George Martin for the Coronation Service of 1911. The remainder follows the same broad and dignified lines, and completes what will surely prove a useful addition to the choir library.

Old Rhymes with New Tunes. By Richard Runciman Terry. Illustrated by Gabriel Pippet.

[Longmans, Green & Co.]

Quite an attractive picture music-book of old rhymes—very suitable as a gift-book for children, whether at Christmas or any other season—has been prepared by Dr. R. R. Terry, organist of Westminster Cathedral. In all, Dr. Terry has composed new tunes for sixteen old rhymes, and he certainly has succeeded in catching the spirit of the verses in a satisfactory fashion. Among the rhymes are 'Cock-a-doodle-doo,' 'Baby, baby Bunting,' 'Sing a song of sixpence,' 'Georgie Porgie,' 'Little Miss Muffet,' 'Humpty-Dumpty,' 'Little Jack Horner,' 'Dapple Grey,' and others. Some of the tunes are really 'catchy,' and will make an obvious appeal to children; but in not a few cases the chromatic intervals will not be so easy to negotiate. As may be expected, the pianoforte accompaniments are musicianly, and there are some delightfully-quaint discords which bring out in a very striking fashion the sense of the words: these are specially in evidence in 'Lady-bird, Lady-bird,' and in 'Dapple Grey.' To add to the attractiveness of the book, Mr. Gabriel Pippet has supplied eight full-page illustrations which are most artistic, and he has also drawn the charming head- and tail-pieces of each tune. Dr. Terry is to be congratulated on his ingenious treatment of the old nursery-rhymes, and the book is sure to obtain a wide popularity.

The Lord looked down from Heaven. Anthem. By Charles Macpherson.

The Benedictus, and Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis for men's voices. Set to music in the key of E major, by Charles Macpherson.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. Macpherson's Anthem, written for two sopranos and alto, is an important contribution to Novello's Chorister Series of Church Music, and to church music generally. The work, while absolutely original without being extravagant, is characteristic of the composer in his happiest vein. Some demand is made upon the musical capacity of the singers, while the organ accompaniment is a study in polyphonic writing. Let it be said at once that the music is really beautiful, and that any trouble it may give will be amply repaid.

The setting of the Benedictus and Evening Canticles, while hardly so congenial, is brimful of cleverness, and there are many fine moments. As examples we may note the change at the words 'hath magnified me,' and the pp opening of the Gloria in C sharp minor, which, after a pause, follows a passage ending in C major. The whole work is that of a thoughtful mind and a highly-equipped technique. We hope and believe the time is rapidly approaching when such music will be within the most ordinary capacity. There is certainly room for it in these days of mediocre and stereotyped examples of so called church music.

An Album of Songs. Second Album of Songs. By B. J. F. Picton.

[Breitkopf & Härtel.]

These two volumes contain music that, without eccentricity or forced originality, arrests the attention and, even where the quality of the ideas fails to win complete approval, constitutes beyond doubt song-writing of a high order. The chief excellence lies in the vocal line, which springs straight from the rhythm and significance of the words (in most cases well-known English lyrics), and has in itself an attraction of melody rather than of 'tune'—as it should be in songs. There is further musical interest in the considered use of free tonality and the careful framing of accompaniments, although in both there is a strong suggestion of mannerism. The composer is given to more pronounced use of the dominant ninth than its flavouring will bear, and is prone to require of the right hand Brahmsian handfuls of notes moving with and surrounding the vocal melody. But the music abounds in telling ideas, such as those which make the whole of 'Let us now take time and play' (Herrick) and the ending of 'Love me little, love me long.' These examples are in the first album, which also contains 'O sweet delight' (Campion) and 'Your heart has trembled' (Henley). The best of the second album is 'Out in mother's garden' (Lady Gloria Fane); the others are 'On the way to Kew' (Henley), 'Love on, dear heart' and 'Epitaph upon a virgin' (Herrick). The collection is the creation of a thoughtful composer, of whose work we would gladly hear more.

Thou art worthy, O Lord. Anthem for Septuagesima Sunday, Trinity Sunday, Harvest Festivals, and general use. By Francis Edward Gladstone.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

A fresh and vigorous example, in five parts (two sopranos), well worth the attention of those who prefer the diatonic style. Though in a somewhat familiar mould, Dr. Gladstone's music is interesting, and he exhibits a mastery of vocal writing and effect which should secure due recognition of his latest effort.

How Eloquent are Eyes. Part-song for S.A.T.B. By John E. West.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This is another example of the unaccompanied music for choirs inspired by the confidence in the advance in choral technique made in recent years. The words are by Shelley. Mr. West has great fluency in writing for voices, and in this part-song he has given full wing to his poetical feeling. We believe we are justified in saying that this, the latest of his works, is his finest effort in the shape of part-songs. The form is free, and the music closely follows the poet's mood. There are several fine climaxes. The music cannot be said to be easy, but it provides fine scope for a well-equipped and highly-trained choir.

HANDEL'S MUSIC IN PARIS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—The current number of the Zeitschrift of the Internat. Musikgesellschaft contains an article on the performances of old music (up to Beethoven) at Paris, which is noteworthy in several respects. It deals with the season 1910-11. The list comprises eleven pages, of which two are occupied by Bach, one-and-a-half by Mozart, and one by Handel. Of English writers, Arne and Purcell appear, with the Elizabethan virginalists Byrd, Bull, Gibbons, Pearson, and Richardson. The writer, M. Prod'homme, says: 'Among the ancients, Bach is most in favour, followed closely by Mozart and Handel.' It is true that the same solos are frequently repeated by different performers. The list includes only public performances; 'but old music, in drawing-rooms and reunions having a truly musical character, has taken an important place, if not indeed preponderating, at the side of contemporary music, and perhaps to the detriment of the music properly called classical.' M. Prod'homme's list might have been more systematically and lucidly stated; he gives, for instance, under Handel, 'Air d'Iole,' and 'Air d'Iole d'Herakles,' and 'Air d'Herakles.' Now in Handel's 'Hercules' Iole sings six different airs; which of them were sung? Very likely one only. However, it is not easy to get full particulars of French programmes; see the article on 'Handel in England and abroad' (Musical Times for August, 1912).

Such strange statements are often made in England respecting Handel, that it is worth while naming the larger works which were performed complete in Paris during the season in question. 'Messiah' (Choral Society of the Sorbonne), 'Israel' (Conservatoire), 'Alexander's Feast,' 'Saul,' and the 'Ode for St. Cecilia's Day' (Société G. F. Handel), are named. In honour of St. Cecilia, choralists of St. Eustache performed the 'Dettingen Te Deum'! They probably did not know why Handel wrote it.

If one wishes to hear Handel, it is advisable to settle in Paris. And still more if one wishes to hear Bach, who seems to appeal to French more than to English taste, and is constantly performed in Paris and the départements.

TALLIS'S PSALM SETTINGS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—Having read the interesting article of 'The early harmonized chants of the Church of England' by Mr. Royle Shore in the current issue of your valuable paper, may I be allowed to point out an inaccuracy. After referring to the chant settings by Tallis of Psalm cxix., Mr. Shore says: 'Mr. Heywood . . . sets out in full the three psalm-settings by Tallis in five-part harmony as printed in Barnard.' This is not correct, for what Mr. Heywood prints, and what Mr. Shore quotes, is an abridged form of Barnard's publication, in which the notes set to every syllable by Tallis are reduced to a single breve. This is misleading to those who have not had an opportunity of seeing the original. In my book on 'The Psalms, their Structure and Musical Rendering,' published in 1903, will be found the complete settings as printed in Barnard, without alteration; and at the Church Congress at Liverpool in 1905 I commented upon these, and some of them were sung as illustrations of my paper by the Choir of Southwark Cathedral under my direction.—Yours faithfully,

A. MADELEY RICHARDSON.

Newport, R.I., U.S.A., Sept. 18, 1912.

'FROM GREENLAND'S ICY MOUNTAINS.'

Dr. Grattan Flood writes to us as follows: In regard to the query put by Mr. F. G. F. Thomas, of Towcester, in your October issue, the age of the organ may be anything from 150 to 180 years. However, it is not correct to state that Bishop Heber 'is said to have composed his tune to the well-known hymn "From Greenland's icy mountains,"' at Towcester. Bishop Heber wrote the words of his once popular hymn while on a visit to Wrexham on Whitsun Eve, 1819, and it was first sung at evening service in Wrexham Church on Whit-Sunday of the year 1819. Heber himself directed the hymn to be sung to the tune of 'Once when the seas were roaring,' composed by Handel, under the title of 'The faithful maid,' and sung in Gay's 'What d'ye call it' in 1715. This melody will be found as Air 28 in the 'Beggar's Opera' (1728), and also in the 'Musical Miscellany,' vol. ii., in 1729. Heber's verses were first published in the Evangelical Magazine for July, 1821.

Obituary.

We regret to have to record the following deaths:

WILLIAM KUHE, on October 8, at his residence, Longridge Road, Kensington, in the eighty-ninth year of his age. He was born at Prague on December 10, 1823. His musical capacity found early vent at the pianoforte and led to his studying under Thalberg. He came to England in 1845, and soon afterwards resolved to settle in this country, where he fraternised with the best-known musicians of the period. He made his first public appearance in London as a pianist at a concert given in 1845 by Miss Emma Lucombe, who became the wife of Sims Reeves. In 1847 he made Brighton his headquarters, and henceforth for many years the musical record of that town is practically that of the enterprise and achievements of Kuhe. It was at one of his concerts at Brighton in 1861 that Adelina Patti, then a child, made her first appearance on a concert-platform. The Musical Festivals, with which Kuhe's name was afterwards associated, began in a small way in the West Street Concert Hall in 1868. Later, a choir was organized, and the arena of the concerts changed to the Dome, where they continued for many years, and enabled the Brighton public to make the acquaintance of numerous important choral and orchestral works and of the powers of all the well-known artists of the day. The scheme was pursued notwithstanding almost constant heavy financial loss. In 1893, on the occasion of his musical jubilee, Kuhe was the recipient of a public testimonial of 400 guineas. In 1886 he was appointed professor of the pianoforte at the Royal Academy of Music, a post he retained until 1904, when at the age of eighty-one he resigned, owing to his growing blindness. He was a Freemason, and in 1874 was selected as organist to the Grand Lodge of England. Kuhe was in his time a brilliant pianist and a capable composer of light music for his instrument. His genial and optimistic personality endeared him to all with whom he had relations. He outlived most, if not all, of the comrades of his prime of life, but to the end he was deeply respected—and, we may add, affectionately regarded—by a large circle of friends.

Miss FRANCES ALLITSEN, the song-composer, at the age of sixty-three, on October 2. She received her musical education at the Guildhall School of Music, and came out as a singer in 1882. Her most popular song was 'There's a land,' which had considerable vogue at the time of the South African War. Others that have been well-known are 'A song of Thanksgiving' and 'Sunset and dawn.' We quote the following from 'A Century of Ballads,' by Mr. Harold Simpson: '"When I started composing" she [Miss Allitsen] said once, "I had no technical knowledge, and found it difficult to put my songs on paper." Then she took them to Mr. Weist Hill, head of the Guildhall School of Music, who was struck with their merit and offered her a free scholarship in the theory of music. She afterwards won the Lady Mayoress's prize for an overture, "Undine."'

GUIDO PAPINI, the famous violinist, in London on October 3. He was born near Florence in 1847. From 1874 onwards he frequently visited England, and in 1893 he settled in Dublin as professor of the violin at the Royal Irish Academy of Music. In 1896, however, he was forced by ill-health to resign this post.

Madame LA SALLE RABINOFF, a talented singer of great repute in America, wife of Mr. Max Rabinoff, the impresario.

THE BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

OCTOBER 1 to 4.

Judged by the Gargantuan feast of music provided on this occasion, it would seem that the Festival was at the zenith of its success. Whatever one may think of this or that interpretation, the fact that such an arduous programme was so remarkably well prepared and performed is one more tribute to Sir Henry Wood's extraordinary industry and capacity. Anything like a comprehensive critical survey of the four days' output is impossible in a monthly periodical in which there is so much else to record. We can only attempt to give general comments.

In the course of the eight morning and evening concerts (the morning ones were divided into two parts) the following works were performed:

CHORAL.

'Elijah,' 'The Music Makers' (Elgar), Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion music, 'The Song of St. Francis' (H. Walford Davies), 'The Messiah,' Verdi's 'Manzoni Requiem,' Brahms's 'Requiem,' 'Sea-Drift' (Delius), 'Be not afraid' (unaccompanied motet, Bach), and 'The Apostles' (Elgar).

VOCAL SOLOS.

'Mad Bess' (Purcell), sung by Miss Muriel Foster; 'Desdemona' scene (Verdi), sung by Madame Donalda; Wotan's 'Abschied' (Wagner), sung by Mr. Clarence Whitehill; and the 'Dance of the Seven Veils' and the closing scene of 'Salome' (Richard Strauss), sung by Madame Aino Ackté; 'Un aura amorosa' (Mozart), sung by Mr. McCormack.

INSTRUMENTAL.

Brandenburg Concerto (No. 3, in G) for strings (Bach); Pianoforte Concerto No. 1, in E flat (Liszt), played by Moriz Rosenthal; New Symphony No. 4, in A minor (Sibelius); Overtures 'Coriolan,' 'William Tell,' and 'Tannhäuser'; Concerto in D, for Violoncello (Haydn), played by Pablo Casals; orchestral drama, 'Fifine at the fair' (Granville Bantock); 'Don Quixote' (Richard Strauss)—the violoncello solo played by Pablo Casals; Symphony No. 7 (Beethoven); Choral Vorspiel for organ, 'In dulci jubilo' (Bach), played by Mr. C. W. Perkins.

Scriabine's 'Prometheus' (The poem of Fire), for orchestra, pianoforte, organ and chorus, was to have been performed, but it was withdrawn owing to the impossibility of time being found for adequate rehearsal.

ARTISTS WHO APPEARED AT THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL, 1861.

[From a photograph in the possession of Messrs. Priestley & Co., Birmingham.]

Madame SHERRINGTON. Mlle. TITIENS. Madame SAINTON DOLBY. Miss PALMER. Madame PATTI. Madame RUDERSDORFF.
Messrs. SIMS REEVES. SANTLEY. MONTEM SMITH. COSTA. BELLETTI. GIUGLINI.

The principal performers were Mesdames Ackté, Donalda, Ada Forrest, Carrie Tubb, Clara Butt, Muriel Foster, Doris Woodall, Messrs. Gervase Elwes, John McCormack, Thorpe Bates, Wilfrid Douthitt, Herbert Heyner, Clarence Whitehill, Herr Moriz Rozenthal (pianoforte), Señor Pablo Casals (violoncello).

The band consisted of twenty first violins, led by Maurice Sons, sixteen second violins, twelve violas, twelve 'cellos, nine double-basses, nine flutes, one piccolo, ten oboes, two oboi d'amore, two oboi da caccia, heckelphone, two cors Anglais, seven clarinets, nine bassoons, eight horns, one tenor tuba, seven trumpets, four trombones, and thirteen other players—percussion, harp, &c., including a 'wind machine.'

The choir consisted of ninety-four sopranos, eighty-five altos, eighty-three tenors, and eighty-nine basses; total, 351. By general consent it was pronounced to be one of the finest Festival choirs ever assembled in this country. The tasks, physical and musical, the choralists had to face were extraordinarily arduous, but almost throughout they were equal to all demands. It was only at the last concert of the series that they betrayed symptoms of fatigue. The excellence of the choral technique displayed must in justice be ascribed mainly to the industry, skill, and unique experience of the chorus-master, Mr. R. H. Wilson, whose name was not recorded in the daily programmes because, we presume, he was not a performer—only a Bunty behind the scenes. To Mr. Wilson's achievements in providing a plastic instrument were added those of Sir Henry Wood, who here, as in every other department of his wonderful activity, brought to bear his genius for taking pains and his indomitable will-power in securing his own interpretations.

Sir Henry Wood was the general conductor for the first time at this Festival. Sir Edward Elgar, Mr. Granville Bantock, Dr. H. Walford Davies, and Mr. Sibelius conducted their own works.

The performance of 'Elijah' with which the Festival opened was one to remember. The choir poured out a magnificent stream of sound, displayed the precision of a military band, and in other ways showed their responsiveness to the ideas of their conductor—ideas not always in consonance with tradition and not without a suspicion of a desire to exhibit virtuosity at all costs. But it must be admitted that the oratorio lends itself to the personal factor more than do the older masterpieces of this class. Mr. Whitehill, as Elijah, gave a highly dramatic interpretation of the part. The other chief soloists were Miss Forrest, Madame Butt, and Mr. McCormack.

At the evening concert the programme was a miscellaneous one. It included two of the most striking novelties produced at the Festival, the new choral cantata, 'The Music Makers,' by Sir Edward Elgar, and the new Symphony (No. 4, in A minor) by Jean Sibelius, both works being conducted by their respective composers. As in our September issue (pp. 566-570) we gave a full analysis of 'The Music Makers,' it will not be necessary to refer here in detail to the beautiful poetic basis of the work supplied by the late Arthur O'Shaughnessy. The performance was a remarkably fine one, and revealed most if not all the subtle and suggestive charm of the music. The probable effect of the quotations from the composer's former works was a matter of curiosity for some listeners who, previous to the performance, harboured a feeling that mayhap the tracing of the quotations and the recollection of their former association might distract attention from their present application. But it turned out quite otherwise, for the leitmotives are so ingeniously and naturally dovetailed into their environment as never to obtrude, and they always seem to fit the situation to a nicety. The climaxes are in places tremendous. One of the most exciting is that to the words 'Trample a kingdom down,' which is almost terrible in its savage intensity. A beautiful choral section ensues to the words:

. . . We, in the ages lying
In the buried past of the earth,
Built Nineveh with our sighing,
And Babel itself in our mirth;

In the climax of this section the whole-tone scale is employed with a weird effect. No other choral music that Elgar has written has risen to finer penetration or expression than that set to the words:

A breath of our inspiration
Is the life of each generation.

The orchestral parts here are supremely beautiful. The contralto solo, especially as sung by Miss Muriel Foster, who is a past-master in the interpretation of Elgar's music, gave a needed note of personal intimacy to the unfolding of the poet's fancy. The solo is soon—almost too soon—concerted with the chorus, but it continues to interest. It leads to one of the most remarkable harmonic devices to be found in the whole work (p. 53, vocal score), and the passage also illustrates the composer's occasional tendency to secure effects by sequences, in this instance of the boldest description. One of the most striking passages in the work is that set to the words, 'For we are afar with the dawning,' 'And the suns that are not yet high.' The tonal and rhythmic means employed here are simple, but the effect is large, expansive, grand. The most important section for the soloist occurs near the end of the work. Here for seventy or more bars the singer delivers the fine appeal of the poet to posterity in the last stanza of the poem:

Great hail! we cry to the comers
From the dazzling unknown shore;
Bring us hither your sun and summers,
And renew our world as of yore;
You shall teach us your song's new numbers,
And things that we dreamed yet before:
Yea, in spite of a dreamer who slumbers,
And a singer who sings no more.

The introduction of the 'Novissima hora' theme at this stage is wonderfully eloquent and searching. After this the music glides like a fleecy cloud to its extinction; the transition from sound to silence is almost imperceptible.

The only other general criticism of the performance we are disposed to make is that the orchestration in places was overpowering, and could not be balanced by the choir.

Sibelius's Symphony brought us into another world—one with which most of us are so unfamiliar that we stumbled in our endeavour to understand. The idiom of the music and its form—with ends that did not seem to finish—left one in bewilderment. Mrs. Newmarch, who knows more of Sibelius's music than most people, says that 'The fourth Symphony, like the earlier ones, is music of an intimate nature, and much of it was thought out and written in the isolation of hoary forests, by rushing rapids, or wind-lashed lakes. There are moments when we feel ourselves alone with Nature's breathing things.'

The work is in four movements: I. Tempo molto moderato quasi adagio; II. Allegro molto vivace; III. Il tempo largo; IV. Allegro.

It is impossible here to discuss the new work, especially as we feel obliged to state frankly that we do not at present understand it sufficiently, which is a way of confessing that the limitations are our own. But we may say that, after hearing rehearsals as well as the performance, the work grew in interest, and we shall be prepared to rank ourselves with its admirers when we are more familiarwith its peculiar mode of expressing temperament. The other items in the scheme were two Overtures, the 'Brandenburg' and the Liszt concertos, 'Mad Bess' (Purcell), magnificently declaimed by Miss Foster, and the clever but frightfully noisy Humoreske on 'Themes of Johann Strauss,' played by Moriz Rosenthal.

At the morning performance on October 2, Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion was given. It was a deeply engrossing interpretation, at one time fulfilling the highest ideals and at another inducing disappointment and distress. The preparation of the great work was marked by that meticulous care that distinguishes all Sir Henry Wood's enthusiasms. The oboi d'amore and the oboe da caccia in the solos, perfectly played, as were also the two solo flutes, were always a fascination to the ear. The choruses were splendidly sung. Never before have we heard 'Have lightnings and thunders' performed with such tremendous effect. Mr. Elwes (the Evangelist) was always adequate, Mr. Douthitt (Jesu) sang well, but yet with not sufficient restraint and dignity. Madame Donalda, placed with Miss Foster at the back of the orchestra, was unable to catch the pitch, and some of the other solo singers were not wholly satisfactory. Miss Foster's singing of the Aria, 'Have mercy, Lord' (No. 47), and Mr. Maurice Sons's playing of the violin obbligati, were things to cherish in the memory. The singing of some of the chorales by the choir of fifty boys was admirable, their voices always standing out as a beautiful distinctive colour. A disturbing factor was the 'expression' which distorted the lines of beauty in the four-part chorales. The idea of treating them as part-songs with verbal points to be emphasised has been discussed before and deprecated, but without effect. So one must perforce accept the sun as with all its defects of spots!

Dr. H. Walford Davies's 'Song of Saint Francis,' for soli, chorus, and orchestra, was performed on the evening of October 2. Report beforehand spoke highly of the work, and it is gratifying to record that the performance confirmed the forecast of its high artistic value. There are ten numbers, each of which is rounded off by a tonic cadence, and can be performed separately. The 'Song' is stated to yield 'Praises of the Lord, as concerning His creatures.' In turn, the Sun, the Moon and Stars, the Wind and the Air, Water, Fire, Sister Earth, Our Mother, Them that forgive for the love of God, Sister Death, all are personified and praised. The naïve beauty of the poem and its varied appeal are suggestive of music.

It must suffice at present to say that the new cantata exhibits a marked advance in the composer's command of fluent invention and power to write picturesquely. The opening number is imposing and gravely beautiful, and withal maintains the tranquil joy of strong faith. The second movement (Moon and the Stars) has much to charm, the third movement (Wind and the Air) seems rather obviously descriptive; that of Sister Water is very well conceived. The 'Fire' movement did not move us so much, although it has great vitality. Sister Earth, which is admirably treated as a tenor solo, formed an effective relief. 'Them that forgive,' for soprano solo and chorus, is a chaste and devotional item that might very well be used as a separate anthem in 'quires and places where they sing.' Sister Death is written for soli tenor and bass. Its peculiar atmosphere recalls 'Everyman'; the ending in the major key maintains almost breathless attention. The final number, in which all the soloists unite with the chorus, leads up to a powerful climax, and then gradually dies away in the softest of pianissimos. The work as a whole was one of the successes of the Festival. Surely it will be heard again, soon!

At the same concert the eagerly-expected first performance of Mr. Granville Bantock's orchestral drama, 'Fifine at the Fair,' was given under the direction of the composer. As we have already stated in the Musical Times, the drama illustrated is that more or less clearly unfolded in Browning's celebrated poem, which is the monologue of a man who himself relates his fall to the attractions of the girl Fifine, a dancer at a fair, notwithstanding his deep regard for his wife Elvire, who is a model of purity and stedfastness. Without going more deeply into an intricate line of thought, these three characters and the events that happen have given Mr. Bantock poetic and dramatic basis for his music. An imaginative analyst of the poem and of the music could, no doubt, discover more things in both than were dreamt of in the philosophy of either the poet or the musician. The ordinary listener, however, who does not want to take his music very seriously and to listen to it with a wet towel round his head, can find ample scope for frank enjoyment in Mr. Bantock's suggestive imagery, lucid melody, and brilliant orchestration.

The music follows the line of the poem in beginning with the Amphibian who, indolently floating on the sea, is provoked to wonderful reflections by the appearance of a stray butterfly. Whatever the significance of this incident may happen to be, it has enabled the composer to give us some delightful music for strings only, divided into twenty-four parts, and we have a charming butterfly represented by wisps from a solo violin. Then begins the real story, the visit of the husband—a Don Juan with a nonconformist sort of conscience—and wife (Elvire) to the fair, the appearance of Fifine, the fascination of the man, and the moral of it all. We have leitmotives associated with Elvire, some realistic fun of the fair, noisy, rollicking, and obstreperous, the charming dance in which Fifine displays her saltatory seductions, the passion beyond control of the man, the subsequent remorse, and the glorification of the constant Elvire.

The Epilogue in the poem, whatever its true significance may be, suggests ultimate relief from storm and stress, and this is finely reflected in the music by a serene and beautiful ending. A feature of the instrumentation is the prominent solo employment of the clarinet. A brilliant and elaborate Cadenza enabled Mr. Charles Draper to display his skill and the capacity of the instrument. The verdict of the public on the whole work was unmistakable. To them, at least, it was a sane and comprehensible contribution.

The 'Don Quixote' Variations excited quite as much amusement by their occasional realism as they did pleasure. The playing of Casals in this work was an unalloyed satisfaction.

The performance of the 'Messiah,' on the morning of October 3, had many fine moments, but the extraordinary license Sir Henry allowed himself in the treatment of some of the choruses was again a disturbing and distressing circumstance. In another column we give detailed particulars of the performance (see p. 726).

The performance of the 'Manzoni Requiem' (Verdi) was made remarkable by the energy and occasional tremendous resonance of the choral singing, and the speciality of Madame Aino Ackté's style of performance. This gifted lady does not always sing with a beautiful quality of voice, but she identifies her interpretation so intensely with the import of the words and their musical expression, that she rivets attention. Her monotoning of the prayer at the end was a thrilling climax of intensity. The other singers were Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. McCormack, and Mr. Whitehill, all of whom were well-equipped for the work.

Delius's 'Sea-Drift' elicited various opinions. It has now been fairly often performed in this country—sometimes well and sometimes badly. For our part we see no reason to alter the feeling we have held from the first, that the work is simply beautiful. The idiom used is strange; its colouring is of the subtlest. The resources brought to bear on its performance at Birmingham were too great. The composer does not employ the full orchestra all through, and he does not want the full choir all through. The 'new choralism' as represented in this work demands a more artistic use of the choral material. Mr. Thorpe Bates sang the bass solo-part with rare insight and temperament.

At the morning concert, on the fourth day, the 'German Requiem' of Brahms was given. The performance was often deeply impressive, yet it missed some of the mighty grief of the more poignant passages. More success attended the exultant moods of the work. Miss Carrie Tubb and Mr. Thorpe Bates were highly efficient.

The second part of the concert began with an extraordinary contrast to the morning's proceedings. It is a far cry from a Requiem to Strauss's 'Dance of the Seven Veils' and the closing scene of 'Salome.' But lunch had intervened, and the audience after all were ready to waive any feelings of incongruity they may have entertained. They were rewarded with one of the greatest sensations of the Festival. The orchestra was magnificent, and Madame Ackté held the audience spellbound by the powerful realism of her passion. After this fever the Beethoven Symphony in A was especially comforting to many minds, and this impression of a sane world was maintained by Mr. Perkins's excellent organ playing of the Bach 'Choral Vorspiel' and by the singing of the unaccompanied motet 'Be not afraid,' which finely showed off the resources of the choir and its high training.

The Festival was brought to a worthy conclusion by a performance of Elgar's oratorio 'The Apostles,' given under the direction of the composer. It was in some respects a disadvantage to all concerned that this noble work was presented as the last item in a series of arduous performances that were preceded, it must be remembered, by still more exacting rehearsals. That the choir under these circumstances betrayed some tendency to faulty intonation, is more a matter for regret than surprise. But otherwise the performance was satisfactory. The soloists were Madame Donalda, Miss Muriel Foster, who again gave us cause for congratulation that she has returned to the concert-platform, Mr. Gervase Elwes, Mr. Henry Heyner, Mr. Wilfrid Douthitt, and Mr. Thorpe Bates. The last-named singer again greatly distinguished himself.

The whole receipts of the Festival were about £10,000, being a few hundred pounds less than was received at the 1909 Festival. Up to the time of going to Press we have not heard particulars as to the net financial result. Whatever this may be, it is a satisfaction to record that the artistic result of the 1912 Festival was equal to that attained at the best of its predecessors.

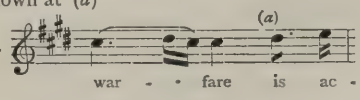
The Festival was began in 1768. Dr. Richter preceded Sir Henry Wood as conductor, and on previous occasions the office was held by Sir Michael Costa.

'The Messiah.'

In our notice of this Festival, given above, we reserve comments on the performance of 'The Messiah' for special treatment. We now give details of the chief points of the performance.

No. 2, 'Comfort ye' (sung by Mr. Gervase Elwes). The playing of the staccato ' accompaniment was a feature. It was not, as it so often is, an intrusively pronounced staccato, but one just insinuated, and it was performed with unity of attack. At the 22nd bar, instead of the customary version shown at (a)

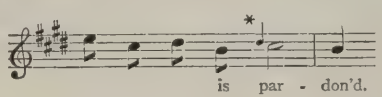
Ex. 1.



Mr. Elwes, as directed by the conductor, rose to the F sharp (b)

Prout's edition also gives the F sharp. At the 26th bar the usual appogiatura D was omitted, only the minim C being sung :

Ex. 2.

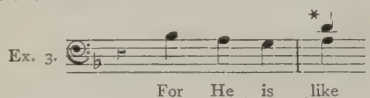


No. 3, 'And the Glory.' M. 132, sometimes faster. The end Adagio had little grandeur, and the 'it' was clicked off intrusively.

No. 5, 'Thus saith' (Mr. Clarence Whitehill). Imposingly vocalised. The long runs, even that with forty notes, were never broken for breath.

No. 6, 'But who may abide.' Began M. 90, and on the voice entering slackened to M. 60, with considerable rubato. At the 10th bar from the end

Ex. 3.

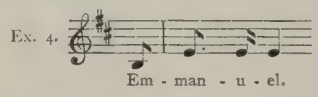


D was sung instead of A.

No. 7, 'And He shall purify' (omitted).

No. 8, 'Behold' (Madame Butt). At the 5th bar the usual appoggiatura was omitted, E being sung on the second syllable of Emmanuel :

Ex. 4.



No. 9, 'O thou that tellest.' Very finely sung by Madame Butt at about ♪ = M. 150, the vocalisation being particularly pure and flowing. Some of the runs were broken for breath. The vowel in 'God' seemed difficult to define on the low C and B. The chorus was taken at an almost frantic pace—M. 168. It was an impetuous rush, and for one at least of the audience the charm of this chorus was obscured.

No. 10, 'For behold.' A deeply impressive performance, not only by Mr. Whitehill but by the orchestra. The usual ff effects at bars 11 and 20 were omitted.

No. 11, 'The people that walked.' Some considerable variations of tempo and some unusual instrumentation.

No. 12, 'For unto us.' This was a performance that greatly disturbed and distressed many of the audience. It began pp, for what reason it is difficult to divine. But this 'reading' was not new. The pace at first was ♩ = M. 72. At the first climax on the word 'wonderful,' the pace was reduced to about M. 48, the former tempo being resumed as the altos emerged at 'Unto us a Child is born.' At the second climax the pace was again brought down to M. 48, and the faster pace resumed when the tenors emerged. This process of variation was renewed at the third climax. Then the basses were led off at a faster pace than ever, M. 80 to 84, and at the fourth climax the slow pace was resumed. The final choral phrase, 'The Everlasting Father ! the Prince of Peace,' was taken accelerando until it reached an exciting pace, and the whole number ended in a feverish glow.

No. 13, Pastoral Symphony. The 'first time' sounded unusually thick as instrumentation, and it failed to interest. On the piano repeat the music was 'cinematographed' with vibrato. On the whole an effective but not an expressive performance.

The Recits. 14, 15, 16, 'There were shepherds,' &c., were somewhat dramatically treated, but they were finely expressive. The orchestra played superbly.

'And suddenly there was with the Angel' was taken at a great pace ♪ = M. 160. It became very jubilant, and having been thus worked up No. 17, 'Glory to God,' was begun pp—an anticlimax ! The pace at the opening was sober and regular, and the choral technique displayed was excellent.

Some crescendos and diminuendos served to show off the choir if they did not show off Handel. At the 18th bar the imitative section was scurried to the point of confusion, the pace being increased. At the 26th bar, where the original theme of the opening bars is repeated, all the resources of choir and orchestra were lashed up to a tremendous ff climax, and the pace, especially for the band, became frantic.

At bar 33, where the imitation is resumed, the pace was again increased and was made accelerando to the pp end of the choral part. Did anyone in the hall derive satisfaction from this lurid treatment of a beautiful and dignified chorus? The present writer heard only words of regret.

No. 21, 'His yoke is easy' (omitted).

No. 22, 'Behold the Lamb of God.' The massive grandeur of this chorus was undisturbed by new 'interpretation.' Pace about ♪ = M. 64. At the sixth bar from the end there was a great forte, which was followed by a sudden piano in the next bar. It was difficult to see what was 'expressed' by this vivid dynamic contrast.

No. 23, 'He was despised.' Only the first part was performed. Here Madame Butt sang with simplicity and dignity, and the accompaniments were played with the utmost delicacy and beauty. The instrumental interludes —about the performance of which elsewhere we wrote in our October number (p. 666)—were always treated tenderly and sympathetically.

No. 24, 'Surely He hath borne our griefs,' was taken rather faster than usual (about ♪ = M. 84). The pace was slackened at bars 18, 19, and here there was a diminuendo. At 'the chastisement' the tempo primo was resumed, and some sforzando emphasis was imported that was intrusive. The chorus ended with the customary diminuendo.

No. 25, 'And with his stripes' (omitted).

No. 25, 'All we like sheep.' This was formally and, from the technical standpoint, splendidly sung. At the 62nd bar the emphatic sforzando accents on every syllable ev - 'ry one to his own way

by all four parts together, an effect which was repeated at the 71st and 72nd bars (20th and 19th bars from the end), at the words :

We have turn-ed ev - 'ry one raised a smile, but had no other effect. It is of course true that the chorus is an arrangement of a duet from one of Handel's earlier works. The Adagio Coda by which Handel so gloriously redeemed the chorus from triviality was sung with gorgeous tone, if with no mood colour.

No. 28, 'He trusted in God.' This wonderful chorus ; which welds fugal form and intensity of expression into a unity, lost some of its virtue by the erratic treatment to which it was subjected. The pace was well chosen ♩= about M. 84. The 'treatment' began at the end of the bass announcement of the subject, the cadence being pulled out rallentando. This happened again at the end of the tenor answer and the alto re-statement. But the idea was abandoned at the treble cadence, probably because of the contrapuntal texture. The exposition being completed, the pace was now increased to M. 96, and at the 23rd bar, where the alto resumes the subject, the pace was M. 100, and this was maintained until the Adagio was reached. At the Adagio the orchestra was 'turned on at the main,' the timpani becoming a specially obstreperous feature, through which we could still hear that the choir were singing for all they were worth.

No. 29, 'They rebuke,' and the following recitatives and airs up to 'Thou didst not leave,' were sung with deep and moving expression by Mr. Elwes, and the accompaniments were played with infinite charm and delicacy.

No. 33, 'Lift up your heads.' The first pace was excellent, 𝅗𝅥=M. 88. The sopranos and altos sang with beautifully blended tone and attractive precision, and all the opening section until the ordinary four-part chorus enters (bar 33) was everything we could desire. Then at bar 34, 'He is the King of Glory,' the pace was suddenly increased to M. 100. A dozen bars later it became hectic and not controlled; the texture of the counterpoint became obscure. A stringendo then brought the pace at bar 54 to M. 108, and at bar 63 it became even faster, with the result that in the rush the splendour of the rolling, florid counterpoint at bars 69 and 70 was not revealed. This 'full speed ahead' was relentlessly maintained to the end. After this, one needed breathing time, and the lunch interval was welcome.

Nos. 34 to 39 inclusive were omitted, and the performance was resumed with—

No. 40, 'Why do the nations,' which served to exhibit Mr. Whitehill's splendid voice and style.

No. 41, 'Let us break.' This was excellent in choral technique and tone. At bars 24, 25, and later at bars 35 to 38, there were some delicate tip-toe piano effects which had a sort of confidential expression that sounded odd in this connection.

No. 44, 'Hallelujah Chorus.' The interpretation of this great masterpiece excited much comment, but, so far as we could gather, little or no difference of opinion.

The opening pace was stately, and the jubialnt expression was well controlled. Then at the unison delivery of the theme 'for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth,' the pace was suddenly brought down to M. 48, the intervening 'Hallelujahs' resuming the quicker pace. Another pull up occurred where the tenors and basses have this theme in unison, the other parts filling in their interjectory 'Hallelujahs' as well as they could. Later, the pace was quickened until the cadence at bar 32. There was confusion at bar 31. At bar 34, 'The Kingdom of this world' was sung piano and adagio with the usual burst of forte, a little increased on this occasion to double ff at 'the Kingdom of our Lord,' the pace here being about M. 46. At the fugal subject, announced by the basses (bar 41), the pace was suddenly increased to M. 96. At bar 51, the beginning of the building up of the great climax, the iterated notes to the 'King of kings' and later 'and Lord of lords' were always sung very slowly and the succeeding 'Hallelujahs' very quickly.

The marked variations of tempi were continued until bar 69, where the bass leads off the subject, and here the tempo was suddenly increased to about M. 104. At bar 7, 'King of kings' was again Adagio, as it was later at 'Lord of lords.' The pace was now (bar 81) increased to M. 112, and a stringendo was commenced. Six bars from the end the pace was M. 120, and the Hallelujahs became frenetic.

When it was over not a few in the hall felt wounded. It is said that Handel when writing this sublime chorus thought he saw all Heaven before him and the great God Himself. Did he hear the 'interpretation' we had to hear at Birmingham?

No. 45, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth.' After the foregoing experience the comforting charm of this beautiful aria was a great relief. Never before have we heard the instrumental parts played to such perfection. Every phrase was caressed with tenderness, and the accompaniment never intruded. Here, indeed, was some compensation and balm.

There was not much else to call for special remark. Nos. 46, 47, 48, and 49 were all sung by the choir. 'Since by man' was taken at M. 50, 'By man also' at M. 148, 'For as in Adam' again at M. 50, and 'Even so in Christ' at about M. 160.

Nos. 50 and 51, 'The trumpet shall sound,' had trumpets galore, and made a brave show of brilliant timbre. Mr. Whitehill sang the aria and Mr. J. Solomon excelled his own record as the solo trumpeter.

All else was omitted until No. 56, 'Worthy is the Lamb,' the performance of which was in every way satisfactory. The 'Amen' chorus, too, was finely sung. A feature was the grandeur of the powerful sostenuto climax near the end.

THE AUTHORS' CLUB DINNER.

It was a happy idea of this genial Club, of which Mr. Algernon Rose is the honorary secretary, to make Dr. W. H. Cummings the chief guest at their dinner on October 14. Mr. J. Mewburn-Levien presided, and there were many members and guests present. In proposing the toast of the evening, Mr. Mewburn-Levien referred in eulogistic terms to the great services rendered to music by their honoured guest. The following is the substance of Dr. Cummings's reply:

MUSIC'S MISSION.

Music is remarkable as being the most ancient of all the Arts, and, paradoxical as it may seem, it is also the youngest.

A question which naturally presents itself is—What do we mean by the term 'Music'? Scientifically, it may be said that music is the result of rhythmic, well-ordered, vibrations—sounds which are not so produced are mere noise and cacophony.

We know perfectly well that our ancestors (say of the 13th, 14th, and 15th centuries) delighted to recognise as the perfection of sweet sounds, combinations of melody and harmony which would be considered barbarous if performed to-day—possibly if those worthy ancestors could re-visit this earth they would be amazed, perhaps distressed, to hear the harmonic combinations we consider beautiful. The truth is that likes and dislikes are matters of growth and environment. An old adage suggests that 'appetite comes with eating.' If that be true, what a heavy responsibility rests on those who provide music for public performance. Surely they should see to it that the programmes not only afford entertainment, but are also calculated to improve and raise the public taste.

Music's mission is to elevate the soul, to improve the mind, to solace the sick and weary, to nerve and encourage the strong, to recall happy memories from the past, to suggest greater and fuller happiness in the future.

Music's mission as an educator and as a potent factor in civilization has been proclaimed during many past ages by great men and great thinkers: Plato, Aristotle, Luther, Shakespeare, Carlyle, Gladstone, and, only a week or so ago, the present headmaster of Eton quoted a State official as saying 'that during the 20th century, music would be the most important educational subject in England.'

To-day we as a nation are keen in our appreciation of music, although it has been the fashion to decry our claim to a distinguished place amongst musical peoples. This has arisen from an ignorance of musical history. It is now a known and accepted fact that the earliest existing example of beautiful melody and tuneful harmony combined is an old English people's song, which, heard by a monk at Reading Abbey, was noted down by him before the year 1240. This composition, full of grace and charm, had no parallel in any country in Europe. The priceless treasure I have described is written on parchment, and is preserved in the British Museum. In the 17th century we had the great and original composer, Henry Purcell, called by his contemporaries the British Orpheus; his life, all too short (only thirty-seven years), afforded time to show that as a creative musician he had then no equal. The advent of the Hanoverian Kings, and of Handel, brought a new fashion into the realm of music, and Handel became the idol of the multitude. Music composers of the day swam with the tide, and too often their effusions were only faint imitations of the great master they admired, and they forgot and neglected the compositions of their compatriot Purcell, or if they remembered them it was only as antique specimens of harmony. Some excuse may be made for musicians when we remember that Addison, writing in 1694 an 'Account of the greatest English poets,' omitted the name of Shakespeare, and that the critics of the day regarded the Elizabethan poets as barbarians. Happily, with our better knowledge and more mature judgments, we are able to recognise the supremacy of Shakespeare and the genius of Purcell.

Let us glance at the more modern side of music. I have said that music is the youngest of the Arts, and this is proved by the fact that the most popular type to-day—orchestral music—came to birth only a little over a hundred years ago. It is the outcome and product of the genius and labours of Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Weber, and, above all, Beethoven. To these names we may add the more modern Berlioz, Mendelssohn, and Wagner. Of living composers I name none. Some are content to strive to make good music, and forward music's mission by using similar means and material to those which produced such excellent results when employed by the great men I have cited. Others are forgetful of the singular and unique attribute of music—namely, that it alone of all the Arts needs no material object or subject for the exercise of its magic powers. Music cannot depict a house, a baby's cradle, or a kitchen. When composers have, more or less successfully, imitated the roaring of a lion, the heavy tread of a beast, or the crowing of a cock, they may have raised a smile, but assuredly they have done so at the expense of the dignity of their art.

I am afraid a lack of inspiration is responsible for some of the vagaries exhibited by certain modern composers. There are also those who find the acknowledged music-scales insufficient for their needs, and who exhibit much ingenuity in groping for new devices. We cannot, however, ignore the fact that our present scales are the ultimate result of experiments which have been made during thousands of years; doubtless when used by a genius they will prove as serviceable in the future as in the past.

Of music's mission in the future we can only speculate. That great discoveries and advances will be made seems inevitable.

Kingsley wrote: 'O to hear but once the music which the whole universe makes as it performs His bidding.' Another writer says, very eloquently: 'Radium receives its energy from, and responds to, radiations which traverse all space—as pianoforte strings respond to sounds in unison and sympathy with their notes. Space is all a-quiver with waves of radiant energy of various lengths, which constitute the harp of life. We vibrate in sympathy with a few strings here and there, with the tiny X rays, actinic rays, light waves, heat waves, and the huge electro-magnetic waves of Herz and Marconi; but there are spaces, numberless radiations, to which we are stone deaf.' Someday, a thousand years hence it may be, we shall know the full sweep of this magnificent harmony, and with it shall vibrate in accord with the Master Musician of it all.

An interesting discussion took place as to the relations of music to stage plays.

THE COMING SEASON IN LONDON.

THE MUSICIANS' COMPANY.

A dinner was given by the Company at the Stationers' Hall on October 22. Amongst the members and guests present were: The Rt. Hon. the Earl of Verulam; the Rt. Hon. Lord St. Leonards, the Rt. Hon. Viscount Hawarden, Sir Homewood Crawford, Sir C. Hubert H. Parry, Bart., Mus. Doc., Sir Charles Villiers Stanford, Mus. Doc., Sir Frederic Cowen, Mus. Doc., Sir J. Frederick Bridge, Mus. Doc., Sir George C. Martin, Sir Hercules Read, Sir George Donaldson, Sir Ernest Clarke, Sir John Muir-Mackenzie, Sir Vincent Caillard, Col. T. C. F. Somerville, Major F. T. Phillips, the Dean of St. Paul's, the Rev. Canon Edgar Sheppard, Canon Pearse, Rev. A. H. Standfast, Major A. J. Stretton, Messrs. Waldorf Astor, M.P., A. E. Bosworth, James Boyton, W. W. Cobbett, C. L. Collard, John C. Collard, Septimus Croft, Clifford B. Edgar, T. C. Fenwick, Myles Birket Foster, Charles A. E. Harriss, Mus. Doc., Arthur F. Hill, E. B. Hoare, E. Markham Lee, Mus. Doc., Alfred H. Littleton, W. G. McNaught, Mus. Doc., Charles Morley, Alexander Murray, Percy Pitt, S. Ernest Palmer, Frank Pownall, C. E. Rube, A. Gordon Salamon, J. H. Skilbeck, T. Lea Southgate, D.C.L., Albert Visetti, A. S. Vogt, Mus. Doc., Cyril Wintle.

After the usual loyal toasts had been duly honoured, Mr. A. F. Hill, the immediate past-master, proposed the health of The Worshipful Company of Musicians and the new master, Mr. W. P. Fuller. He said that Mr. Fuller had laboured hard to give vitality to the work of the Company. In response, the Master made a lucid and interesting speech, and congratulated the Company on its success and utility. He then presented the Company's silver medals, which had been won by Band-Corporal Arthur E. Morgan (Royal Naval School of Music), Student H. E. Dowell, R.G.A. (Royal Military School of Music), and Mr. Eugène Aynsley Goossens (violin, Royal College of Music). Mr. Clifford B. Edgar, the senior warden, proposed a toast to the new honorary freeman of the Company, Sir Charles Villiers Stanford, who in response said that before coming to the dinner he consulted a friend as to what he (Sir Charles) should do on this occasion, and he was strongly advised to say 'Thank you' and sit down. But he did not undertake to act on this advice. He recalled a conversation he once had with a revered member of the Company, John Stainer, in which Stainer said in reference to chimes, 'What a pity each town has not got its own distinctive chimes, instead of simply imitating Oxford chimes.' Later, he (Sir Charles), had the chance of composing the chimes for Bow Church, Cheapside. He had the good luck to find a tune connected with Whittington, and out of that he concocted four 'quarters' and left the hour to take care of itself. Afterwards, he had a letter from the Vicar congratulating him that he had supplied the City with a composition that would last longer and be heard more often than many of the larger compositions which he (Sir Charles) had inflicted on a long-suffering public! He (Sir Charles) added a humorous reference to the proceedings of the Meistersingers in connection with their Guild. He recalled the direction of Hans Sachs, 'Honour your native masters,' and in conclusion he expressed his deep sense of the honour he himself had received.

The guests were toasted, and the Earl of Verulam and Mr. C. Wintle, Master of the Company, replied on their behalf.

An excellent selection of music was provided by students of the Royal College of Music. The singers were Miss Florence Mellors, Miss Dora Arnell, Mr. Ivor Walters, Mr. George Baker; and Mr. Eugène A. Goossens played a violin solo in a highly artistic style. The accompanists were Mr. Harold Samuel and Mr. Hurst Bannister.

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

There can be no doubt that British composers have shown to uncommonly good advantage during the recent season of 'Promenades.' Among the most individual, imaginative and pleasing of the works that have built up this record is Mr. Frank Bridge's suite 'The Sea,' which received its first performance on September 24. Its four sections depict 'Sea-scape,' 'Sea-foam,' 'Moonlight' and 'Storm' convincingly, and apart from their suggestiveness of mood they have a source of interest in their fluent development and, in particular, the compelling effectiveness of their scoring.

The sea as a subject for musical painting also entered into the scheme of things on October 8 and 10. On the former evening the orchestra, much increased in the wood-wind department, gave the first performance of a Nocturne by Madame Poldowski (Lady Dean Paul), reflecting the sensations of night on an island off the West Coast of Scotland. The dismal and the mysterious were admirably conveyed, and realistic suggestions of the movement and noise of birds added point. There was imagination, reticence, and sureness of touch; but the lack of musical interest did not provoke a wish for a second hearing. On October 10, the sea was shown in two of Mr. Edgar L. Bainton's 'Celtic sketches' which depict, first, the sorrow of women bereaved of husbands, sons, and lovers by the sea; secondly, 'Sea rapture'; and thirdly, Pharais, the Celtic Paradise. These works testify to a strong mastery of the technique of composition, but a looser grip of musical expression. They contain, however, much interesting and grateful music.

On September 24 there were also introduced eight dances by Mozart as orchestrated by Steinbach; they charmed until the three-four 'Ländler' rhythm grew monotonous.

The concert piece for organ and orchestra by Mr. Benjamin Dale, that was produced on September 25, was written over ten years ago in the composer's student days, and is correspondingly immature in thought. Music from Mr. Roger Quilter's 'Where the rainbow ends,' was heard as a concert-suite for the first time on September 26, and received a warmly enthusiastic reception with its daintiness of melody and workmanship.

The Violin concerto by the late lamented Samuel Coleridge-Taylor, that was performed, with Mr. Arthur Catterall as soloist, for the first time in England on October 8, was originally produced in America, as recorded in our columns. Since that occasion the composer is understood to have made considerable revisions, which were completed only shortly before his death. It is before all things genial; bold rhythms abound, the construction is always logical and effective, and much of the orchestration has an aplomb that could only be paralleled in Tchaikovsky. Although the work belongs more largely to the downright type of 'Hiawatha' and 'Nero' than to the subtler 'Tale of Old Japan,' there are moments which point more definitely to the future than any of Coleridge-Taylor's previous music.

The 'Schauspiel Overture' by Korngold, that was heard on October 17, is presumably a later work than the 'Schneemann' music, and is in a more heroic vein. It is a marvel of creative enterprise, resourcefulness and skill, but falls short of its object owing to its restlessness, and the lack of a fully considered quiet section as a contrast to its impetuosity. A young composer of Korngold's advancement claims the compliment of the highest critical standard.

In his 'Six Orchestral Variations and an Epilogue' on 'Down among the Dead Men,' produced on October 22, Mr. Julius Harrison evidently set himself a congenial task, as happy ideas abound and every page interests and carries conviction. His development of the theme goes further than mere orchestral elaboration. New themes arise from the old, or are introduced independently and then attached to the main theme, the whole being carried out with an exuberance of device and an extremely resourceful technique.

One of the largest audiences of the season gave a rousing reception on October 24 to three 'English Dances' which Mr. Algernon Ashton has exhumed, and clothed orchestrally, after nearly thirty years of burial in the form of pianoforte duets. They are not unpleasing examples of the 'Henry VIII.' type, built on springy rhythms, with a light-hearted ingenuousness permeating their melody. The second of them was encored.

Mention must be made of an admirable performance of Strauss's 'Ein Heldenleben' on October 16 (in the place of Weingartner's third Symphony), and of two enjoyable experiences that fell incidentally to our lot. These were performances, on successive nights, of two of Mozart's Pianoforte concertos—that in E flat being played on October 15 by Señor Bienvenido Socias, and that in D minor on October 16 by Miss Guiomar Novaes. In both cases the pianoforte playing was ideal.

From September 30 to October 4, in the absence of Sir Henry Wood at Birmingham, the concerts were conducted by Dr. Georg Henschel. The season came to an end on October 26. It has been of well-sustained interest, and if general impressions are a guide it has been the best attended of recent years.

London Concerts.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The deepest impression amongst the many that were made by the first concert of this series, which took place on October 19, was that of a memorable performance of Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony. It repaid, more than any other work, the scrupulous care that Sir Henry Wood devotes to phrasing and balance, and it gained most from the augmentation of the string section, which increased the incisiveness of many string passages and the sweetness of the piano tone. Something of a sensation was created by the first performance of Mr. Percy Grainger's 'Passacaglia' on the folk-tune 'Green bushes,' as both the manner and matter of the piece and the composer's strenuousness as a conductor were a new experience for a large part of the audience. In Mr. Grainger's characteristic style the tune is stated and re-stated, decorated and re-decorated, time after time, as if for the sheer fun of the thing. Mr. Grainger has done this before with greater success; in spite of the exhilaration that everyone present was bound to feel, the score sounded as if it looked better on paper. Señor Casals played Concertos of Tartini and Saint-Saëns in a way that needs no description.

The concert given by Messrs. Thibaud, Casals, and Bauer, at Queen's Hall, on October 9, came after a provincial tour that had evidently enabled the performers—each distinguished as a soloist—to discover and remove every weak spot in their ensemble and to perform together with organized refinement and wonderful beauty of effect. No description, other than superlative epithets of praise, is wanted for their interpretations of the Pianoforte trios, by Schubert, in B flat, Op. 99, by Schumann in G minor, Op. 110, and by Beethoven, in E flat, Op. 70, No. 2. At their second concert, on October 16, they played Beethoven's Trio in D, Op. 70, No. 1. Brahms's Horn trio (with violoncello in the place of horn), and Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor.

The first of Miss Gwynne Kimpton's new series of orchestral concerts for young people took place at Æolian Hall on October 12. Mr. Stewart Macpherson opened with an admirably lucid description of the classical symphony in general and, in particular, that of Haydn in D, which was well played by the orchestra under Miss Kimpton's direction. Miss Fanny Davies played Mendelssohn's G minor Pianoforte concerto, and Mr. Roland Jackson sang 'In native worth' from 'The Creation.'

A concert of Mr. Bemberg's compositions was given at Queen's Hall on October 15 with Miss Maggie Teyte, Mr. John McCormack, Mr. Wilfred Douthitt, Mr. F. A. Sewell, the Novello-Davies Choir, and the composer himself as exponents. The lyric scene for soprano solo and chorus, 'La mort de Jeanne d'Arc,' excerpts from the opera 'Leilah,' and miscellaneous numbers were given.

The Classical Concert Society opened its season on October 16 with a programme of concerted vocal and instrumental music given by Miss Lillie Wormald, Madame Emily Thornfield, Mr. John Adams and Dr. Henschel as vocal quartet, the Misses Aranyi (violin), Mr. Frank Bridge (viola), Messrs. Frank Davey and Walter Wiltshire (pianoforte). Apart from Henschel's 'Serbisches Liederspiel' cycle for vocal quartet and pianoforte, and Dvorák's Terzetto for two violins and viola, the programme consisted of music by Brahms.

RECITALS

Mr. Fritz Kreisler has again been a prominent figure in the opening events of the London season. He gave a recital solus at Queen's Hall on September 29, with a programme consisting chiefly of old music, and on October 10 and 14 he collaborated with Signor Busoni in two recitals at the same hall. Whenever Signor Busoni appears before the public, whether as pianist or as composer, he conveys the impress of a magical personality, a strong and daring intellect, and a wonderful command of means. There is no want of appreciation for the fine, free, and open magnificence of Herr Kreisler's playing in the remark that on both these occasions the pianist was the predominant partner. On October 10 the greatest feature was his performance of César Franck's 'Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue.' The recital opened with Signor Busoni's Sonata in E minor for violin and pianoforte, written twelve years ago, before he started groping in the depths for new musical expression. It is written in one movement of broad intelligible outline, and its type of expression is a high but not unbending intellectuality. On October 14 Signor Busoni played his 'Sonatina,' which had been heard before in London—a work of equal calibre, with more harmonic daring. The production of Signor Busoni's completed version of an unfinished Fantasia by Liszt on two airs from 'Le nozze di Figaro' was interesting as an event, but not musically valuable. The other concerted works played were Beethoven's Sonata in G, Op. 96, and that of César Franck.

Miss Florence Thomas and three other pianoforte pupils of her brother, Mr. C. G. Thomas, gave a recital at Broadwood's on October 3.

Mr. James Richardson, a violoncellist and composer, better known in Manchester than in London, appeared in both capacities at Steinway Hall on October 7, and showed how earnest and serious are his aims.

As a foretaste of what they may shortly hear in their own country, Americans in London were enabled to hear the violin-playing of Mr. Elman at Queen's Hall on October 8. Its strength and beauty were as complete as ever.

Mr. York Bowen gave a Recital at Æolian Hall on October 8, and renewed the fascination of his abandon as a pianist. As a composer he was unfair to himself in resuscitating a sonata ten years old.

Miss Doris Woodall, of wide renown as an operatic artist, bids fair to become equally distinguished as a Lieder singer, for she showed exceptional insight and ability at Bechstein Hall, on October 15, in a programme of songs by Schubert, Brahms, Franz, and Wolf, with two by Mr. Jervis-Read.

Mr. Archy Rosenthal gave a pianoforte recital, with his usual ability, at Æolian Hall on October 17. Pianoforte duets were played by the Misses Sutro at Steinway Hall on the same evening, in a manner to show that these ladies had studied well not only the music but the art of duet playing. Exceptional accomplishments were displayed at Bechstein Hall on October 19 by Mr. Vivian Burrows, a violinist new to London.

Mr. Max Pauer's pianoforte playing was as brilliant, strong and arresting as ever at Bechstein Hall on October 19. It is worthy of note that he thought it worth while to include six of Mendelssohn's 'Lieder ohne Wörte' in his programme.

Two delightful events remain to be recorded—the joint recital of Messrs. Borwick and Henschel at Queen's Hall on October 21, and that of Miss Guiomar Novaes at Bechstein Hall on October 22.

Mr. A. de Valmency gave his first pianoforte recital at the St. John's Hall, Lewisham High Road, on September 23.

American songs, largely but not entirely of the ballad type, were sung by Miss Maggie Teyte and Mr. Charles W. Clark, at Queen's Hall, on October 3, and Mr. Elman played violin solos. The personality of the artists engaged brought great success to the venture.

Madame Melba signalized her return to England by appearing at the Albert Hall on October 5, in a miscellaneous concert given with the distinguished assistance of M. Ysaye, Mr. Backhaus, and Mr. Edmund Burke. Naturally she was welcomed with enormous enthusiasm and symbolic horticultural specimens. Her contributions to the programme included the 'Mad scene' and the 'Jewel song.'

The Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society opened its season on October 5 with a magnificent performance of 'Elijah,' under Mr. Allen Gill's direction. The chief soloists were Miss Gertrude Blomfield, Miss Violet Oppenshaw, Mr. George Foxon, and Mr. Thorpe Bates.

A lecture-concert of exceptional interest was given by Mr. E. S. A. Van der Straeten, at City of London College, on October 17, the subject being the viol da gamba, and the programme being music in which that instrument takes part. The lecturer himself played an English seven-stringed viol, dated 1640. His associates were Miss Frances Jenkins (vocalist), Miss Grace Adie (pianist), and Mr. Norman Greiffenhagen (violoncellist).

Mr. Ben Johnson's season of Saturday Popular Concerts at the Victoria Hall, Ealing, was successfully inaugurated on October 12, when Mr. Johnson had the assistance of Mr. Viggo Kihl (solo pianist).

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

The first musical event after the Birmingham Triennial Musical Festival, concluded on October 4, was an exceedingly interesting chamber concert, given in the Town Hall, on October 11 by Mr. Harold Bauer, M. Jacques Thibaud and Señor Casals. With such an artistic combination of first-rank players, one expected great things, and the audience present, by no means a large one, was rewarded by listening to an admirably framed programme of music, which included Beethoven's Trio in E flat, Op. 70, No. 2, for violin, 'cello and pianoforte, and Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor, Op. 66, for the same instruments. Perfect unanimity, beauty of tone, and complete mastery in every way, characterized their magnificent interpretation of these well-known works, but the Town Hall is not an ideal place for chamber-music, and one lost many of the more delicate passages in the Beethoven Trio allotted to the strings.

On October 12, the Midland Musical Society gave a popular Saturday night concert, the first of the season, the work chosen being Handel's 'Messiah,' which attracted an enormous audience to the Town Hall; indeed, so great was the demand for admittance, that hundreds had to turn from the doors in great disappointment. Mr. A. J. Cotton conducted a good all-round performance, modelled on traditional lines, massive and telling, just what the audience enjoyed. Their appreciation was so spontaneous and unanimous, that in spite of the special notice in the programme, that 'owing to the sacred nature of the subject the audience is respectfully requested to refrain from applause, unless at the end of each part,' each number from the very beginning was received with unstinted enthusiasm. The choir now numbers 300 voices, is well-balanced, and in efficiency meets all requirements. The principal artists were Miss Elsie Yardley, Miss Emily Rudge, Mr. John Collett, and Mr. William Coleman, of Manchester Cathedral, their efforts being in every way entitled to much praise. The orchestra, so ably led by Mr. T. H. Smith, rendered excellent services, and Mr. C. W. Perkins, needless to add, gave valuable help on the organ.

The first Harrison Concert of the season, which took place in the Town Hall on October 21, was devoted to a pianoforte recital by the eminent Polish pianist, M. Paderewski. The programme, which was thoroughly representative did not however include any novelty. Beethoven's great Sonata, Op. 109, was given an ideal reading, full of charm and expressiveness.

BOURNEMOUTH.

The concluding weeks of the Summer concert season contained a few features worthy of record. At the Symphony Concerts, for instance, which in the Summer include a preponderance of compositions of popular though very far from trivial character, the principal works performed were Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, the 'Jena' Symphony, Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony, Weber's 'Der Freischütz' Overture, Elgar's 'In the South' Overture, Liszt's symphonic-poem, 'Les Préludes,' and the 'Iphigenie in Aulide' Overture of Gluck.

On the evening of September 24 Mr. Robert Radford participated with the orchestra in the performance of a Wagner programme. On the following day a pianoforte recital of Chopin's compositions was undertaken by Mr. Victor Benham. Two successful recitals by Backhaus and Mischa Elman, and Miss Marie Hall and Mark Hambourg respectively, the first on October 2 and the second on October 9, formed a kind of bridge between the Summer and Autumn seasons, the latter period actually beginning with the first of the eighteenth series of Symphony Concerts on October 10. Good as the foregoing recitals were, it remained for Harold Bauer, Jacques Thibaud, and Pablo Casals to set the seal of perfection upon the musical exploits of the current season, so far as it has gone. Exquisite in intention and marvellous in execution, the playing of these three incomparable artists surpassed all expectations. Nothing could have been more masterly than their interpretations of Beethoven's splendid Trio in E flat and the very fine C minor Trio by Mendelssohn.

The Symphony Concert series opened with considerable éclat on October 10, the programme containing such impressive works as the 'Leonore' No. 3 Overture by Beethoven, Glazounow's C minor Symphony, and Schumann's Pianoforte concerto. The capital orchestra, thoroughly well-trained by Mr. Dan Godfrey, treated the Overture and Symphony with much enlightenment, and Miss Tina Lerner's interpretation of the Concerto was marked by a fund of sympathy and understanding that revealed the true artist. A novelty here was a tone-poem, 'The sunken bell,' by Metzl, but the work failed to make an impression.

Monday, October 14, saw the inauguration of a new series of orchestral concerts—the Monday 'Pops.'—which are to take the place of the Classical Concerts of former years, it being thought that the latter series held too much in common with the Symphony Concerts to justify a separate existence. The scheme of the Monday 'Pops.' will comprise 'one-composer' programmes, national concerts, and programmes illustrative of the 'Evolution of the Overture,' 'Suite,' 'Dance,' &c. Chamber-music, too, will receive its due. The first concert was (with one exception) devoted to Wagner, the arrangement of the programme being such as to include most of his overtures—not omitting the very convincing 'Faust' Overture—in their chronological order.

Outside the Winter Gardens the sole event of importance has been a visit from the Moody-Manners Opera Company, the Theatre Royal accommodating the organization during a week's stay.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

The Plymouth Corporation Concerts opened auspiciously on October 5, and the borough organist, Mr. H. Moreton, has booked a series of interesting events for the season.

Towards the cost of a new organ for Peverell Wesleyan Church a miscellaneous concert was organized, on October 9, by Sergeant A. E. Cotton, R.M.L.I. Greenbank United Methodist Church Choir performed Parts 1 and 2 of 'The Creation' on October 13, under the conductorship of Mr. R. Lang, organist. The permanent choir was augmented for the occasion, and though the soprano tone preponderated the choruses were sung with good rhythm and accuracy. The voices were supported by a capable band, the choral and orchestral forces numbering 100. Mr. W. Wingate led the band, and Mr. Harold Lake gave valuable assistance at the organ. The soloists were Miss Ethel Pascho and Messrs. Alec Sanders and Harry Smith.

On the same date the choir of Stonehouse Congregational Church sang Gaul's 'Ruth,' under the direction of Mr. Fred W. Chorley, organist.

Mr. J. W. Newton, on October 15, opened a new series of Symphony Concerts at Stonehouse. Beethoven's C minor was selected for performance, but a more satisfactory interpretation was given of Cherubini's overture to 'Anacreon.' A four-movement suite by Lacombe, 'La Verbena,' was played for the first time, but did not leave a serious impression, though in the third number, 'Les Sérénades,' were some original effects of rhythm and orchestration. Mr. C. Matthews, solo clarinet, gave a good performance of a concerto by Mozart for his instrument with orchestra.

Members of the South-Western section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians broke the usual monotony by inviting musicians and musical amateurs in the district to a lecture-recital on October 19, by Miss Fanny Davies, at Plymouth, on 'Schumann and reading between the lines.' Dr. Weekes presided, supported by Mr. R. B. Moore, hon. secretary, Mr. T. Roylands-Smith, hon. treasurer, Dr. (Mrs.) E. B. Guard and Miss Robinson, local organizers.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

The Exeter Choral Society, despite a deficit on last year's work, has started this season with renewed vigour under the training of Mr. Allan Allen, and has taken in hand Elgar's 'From the Bavarian Highlands' for performance at the end of November. Plympton Choral Society is also suffering from financial deficit, but has resolved to undertake Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' and Parry's 'Ode to St. Cecilia,' under the direction of Mr. David Parkes, and to try the experiment of giving its concert before Lent instead of after Easter. As a result of the performance of sacred music by the Exmouth Choral Society at Withycombe, in September, the sum of £10 4s. has been given to the relief of the poor, and Mr. A. Raymond Wilmot has been re-elected conductor. The similar post in connection with Crediton Musical Society will be filled by Mr. N. F. Byng Johnson; but it is regrettable to record that the Axe Vale Musical Society (Seaton) has decided to lie dormant for a year on account of lack of support. The Newtonian Male Quartet, with outside help, gave a concert at Dartmouth on October 1.

At Torquay, on October 5, a Grieg recital attracted much interest, the performers of songs and pianoforte pieces by the lamented composer being Miss Ellen Beck, Miss Johanne Stockmarr, and Madame Grieg. Mr. Norman Kendall gave a lecture and vocal recital at Newton Abbot on October 14, his subject being 'The singer and the song.'

The authorities at H.M. Prison at Dartmoor are so convinced of the moral value of musical performances that they periodically arrange such events for the benefit of the convicts, and on September 26 the band of the 2nd Sherwood Foresters gave two military concerts in the Prison as a sequel to a sacred concert given in July.

The new Municipal Orchestra at Torquay gave a first symphony concert in the Pavilion on October 2, when, under the direction of Mr. Basil Hindenberg, Beethoven's C minor was thoughtfully interpreted, and with such evident seriousness of purpose that one hopes this band will establish regular symphony performances.

To mark the re-opening of Ivybridge Wesleyan Church after renovation, the choir sang the cantata 'The Ruler's Daughter,' on October 6, conducted by Mr. G. F. Bush, with Mrs. K. Trotman at the organ; and on October 10, Mr. R. Pappin, of Plymouth, gave an organ recital.

CORNWALL.

Liskeard Choral Society has decided to give its concert at the end of January, 1913, instead of during the Easter season. Mr. Walter Weekes has been re-elected conductor, and Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' will be the work performed. It is gratifying to note that Lostwithiel Choral Society will this year be resuscitated, Mr. E. A. Russell being the conductor. Goldsithney Wesleyan Choir gave a sacred concert on October 4, and the combined choirs of Camborne and Helston Wesleyan Churches sang 'The Creation' at Helston on October 7, along with several choruses from 'The Messiah.' Mr. H. V. Pearce conducted, and Mr. A. Waters was at the organ.

Mr. E. Tregarthen has been elected conductor of Penzance Male-Voice Choir in succession to Mr. R. N. Thomas, resigned through ill-health. The new season will be marked by the absence of alto voices, and in future only pure male-voice music will be sung. A concert will be given in January, and the Choir intend competing in the Cornwall County Music Festival next Spring.

On October 10 a sacred concert was given at Treruffe Hill by Redruth Wesley Choir, conducted by Mr. H. Dennis at the organ. On the next day the Germoe Male Choir gave an excellent programme under the direction of Mr. Pryor.

Launceston Amateur Operatic and Dramatic Society has decided to continue work under the training of Mr. E. Tregoning. Mr. Hedley M. Lamerton's Junior Operatic Society gave a successful representation of the three-act Japanese Operetta, 'Princess Ju Ju,' at Bodmin, on October 2, assisted by his private Orchestral Society, the latter also contributing to the programme of a concert for charitable purposes.

DUBLIN.

With the first of the Sunday Orchestral Concerts, on October 13 the serious musical season may be said to have commenced. The programme included Mozart's 'Haffner' Symphony, Rossini's Overture 'The Siege of Corinth,' Beethoven's 'Leonora' No. 3, Albanesi's Idyll 'Pace' (arranged for string orchestra by Dr. Esposito), and Rubinstein's 'Feramors' ballet music. Dr. Esposito conducted the band, which numbers some thirty players, and the soloists were Miss Nettie Edwards, vocalist, and Signor A. Simonetti, violinist, who has come to reside in Dublin as professor at the Royal Irish Academy of Music.

On October 20 the programme included Beethoven's second Symphony; Weber's 'Oberon' Overture; Smetana's 'Bartered bride' Overture; and two Entr'actes from 'Proud Maisie,' by Hamilton Harty. The soloists were Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees ('cello) and Mr. T. W. Hall, vocalist.

A huge audience filled the Theatre Royal on October 18 to hear Melba, Ysaye, Backhaus, and Burke.

Music of a different character has attracted large audiences to the Kingstown Pavilion, where Kandt's Band has completed a three weeks' engagement.

At the Sackville Hall the usual winter series of Saturday Night Popular Concerts commenced on October 12. They will be organized this season by Mr. Robert Harrison (one of our few tenor vocalists) and Mr. Sealy Jeffares. The charges for admission range from 3*d.* to 2*s.* and the concerts fill a very important place in the social life of the North Side of Dublin.

The annual general meeting of the members of the Feis Ceoil Association was held on Monday, October 14, in the Mansion House. Dr. George Sigerson presided. The report shows a profit of £29 on the last Festival, and this in spite of an increase in prizes of over £40 on the 1911 Festival. The lack of a concert hall suitable for large choral bodies was commented on by Professor Oldham in the course of the meeting. One of the features of past Festivals was the singing of the massed choirs taking part in the various competitions, but for some years this interesting feature has not been included owing to lack of the necessary space in the Antient Concert Rooms.

GLASGOW.

Mr. A. M. Henderson announces two chamber concerts, the performers being Dr. Georg Henschel, vocalist, Mr. A. M. Henderson, pianist, and the St. Petersburg String Quartet (Court Quartet). For their winter's study the Glasgow Grand Opera Society (Mr. Hutton Malcolm) have selected 'Carmen,' the Lyric Club 'Paul Jones,' and the Odeon Operatic Society 'A Petticoat Prince,' a new comic opera by Mr. Bernard Johnson. The City Hall Saturday Evening Concerts began the fifty-ninth year of their existence on October 5. These excellent entertainments, which take the form usually of a ballad concert, enjoy a large measure of public support. The only other events to be recorded this month are the first of the Harrison Concerts, some concerts at which Melba, Ysaye, Backhaus, Stella Carol, &c., have appeared, and a week's performances by the Castellano Italian Opera Company.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

The winter season officially commenced on October 8, when the Philharmonic Society's first concert took place. An interesting programme was carried through successfully, the chief orchestral feature being the exceptionally fine performance of Liszt's 'Les Préludes,' which Sir Frederic Cowen conducted. In Beethoven's Violin concerto,

Kreisler's reading of the great classic chiefly emphasised its lyrical beauty, and also the opportunities for technical display provided in the three cadenzas, which he played with absolute mastery. He had two especially attentive and appreciative listeners in MM. Ysaye and Backhaus. Miss Maggie Teyte made a favourable impression by her fresh soprano voice and ardent style, especially in Musetta's song from Puccini's 'La Bohême.'

The syllabus of free lectures provided in various centres by the local authorities includes 'Indian folk-songs' (Mr. Ananda Chinnappa); 'Handel and his music,' 'Brahms: his work, his friends, and critics,' 'Mozart and his music' (Rev. H. H. McCullagh); 'English composers of yesterday and to-day,' and 'Music as a language' (Mr. J. Raymond Tobin); 'Opera: its origin and development,' and 'Sir Arthur Sullivan and his music' (Mr. Albert E. Workman); 'Purcell' and 'West country songs' (Mr. Ernest Young); 'Handel's operas and incidental music' (Mr. W. A. Roberts); and 'Old English songs and ballads' (Miss Maude Hammond).

The Waterloo Choral Society, and the St. Cecilia, Claughton, Choral Society, under Mr. J. W. Appleyard's direction, will study Parry's 'Judith' and Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' this season. On the occasion of their golden wedding Mr. and Mrs. Appleyard were recently the recipients of warm congratulations, and also of a substantial token of regard from past and present pupils and friends.

The violin and pianoforte recital given by MM. Kreisler and Busoni on October 4 was remarkable on account of the sparse audience and also for the examples of Busoni's compositions offered in his violin and pianoforte Sonata No. 2, in E minor, pianoforte 'Fantasie on a Bach theme,' and Sonatina.

A similarly small audience greeted those admirable players Mr. Harold Bauer, Señor Casals, and M. Jacques Thibaud at their concert on the following day, October 5. They had no reason to complain of the heartiness of appreciation aroused by their performances of Schubert's B flat Trio, Op. 99, and Beethoven's E flat Trio, Op. 70, No. 2, which were characterized by great beauty of blending tone, and interpretation.

The ready response of the public to the attraction of a great singer was shown at Madame Melba's concert on October 10, when the famous prima donna gave several examples of her undimmed powers and vocal art. She was notably assisted by M. Ysaye, Mr. Backhaus, Mr. Edmund Burke (baritone), M. Gaubert (flute), and M. Lapierre (accompanist).

To the enterprise of the Gramophone Company was due the opportunity of hearing the New Symphony Orchestra conducted by Mr. Landon Ronald in the Philharmonic Hall on October 12.

At the dramatic recital given by Miss Lilian Thomson in the Rushworth Hall, on October 11, interesting musical reliefs were provided by the Misses Helena (pianoforte), Isabel (violin), and Mary McCullagh (violoncello), and the latter two gifted sisters also collaborated with Dr. A. W. Pollitt at the organ, in Brahms's Concerto for violin, 'cello and orchestra, Op. 102, which was played in St. Mary's Church at Dr. Pollitt's organ recital on October 2.

The Rodewald Concert Club, of which Sir Charles V. Stanford is president, has entered upon its second season with every prospect of increasing favour. The locale has been changed to the 'Bear's Paw' Restaurant, where, on October 14, there was a good attendance of members and friends to hear the Rawdon Briggs Quartet play Tchaikovsky's Op. 22 and Beethoven's Quartet, Op. 59. With Mr. H. E. Blenkarn at the pianoforte, Mr. Briggs and Mr. Hatton ('cello) played several solos, and the evening was spent listening to good music under informal social conditions.

Thanks to the enterprise of Sir Joseph Beecham, the habitués of the Olympia Music Hall, a huge building, have had the opportunity of assisting at performances of 'compressed' opera at prices ranging from twopence upwards. In dealing with such well-worn public favourites as 'Carmen,' 'Faust,' 'Bohemian Girl,' and 'Il Trovatore' the method was to offer the essential or most popular features of each work. Along with Miss Doris Woodall and Mr. John Bardsley were other artists of similar experience and ability, and the orchestra was alertly conducted by Mr. Isidore Schwiller.

Mr. John Lawson has drawn up an interesting scheme for the orchestral concerts of the Sunday Society, arranged to begin on October 27. Among the new works in this scheme are Arensky's Pianoforte concerto (Miss Elsie Walker), Hans Sitt's Concertstück for viola and orchestra, 'Keltic Suite, Op. 29 (J. H. Foulds), and several compositions by Mr. Julian Clifford, viz., Coronation March, 'Semper paratus,' duet for two violins, 'Fairy fancies,' and Pianoforte concerto No. 1, in E, in which the composer will play, on December 22.

Mr. R. J. Forbes, hitherto known as an expert accompanist, was heard with approval as a solo pianist at the recital he gave in conjunction with Mrs. Norman Melland, an accomplished lieder singer, in the Rushworth Hall on October 1.

The first of Mr. Percy Harrison's series of four Subscription Concerts took the form of a Pianoforte recital by Mr. Paderewski in the Philharmonic Hall on October 17, when Mr. Harrison's enterprise was rewarded by a large and keenly-appreciative audience. The famous artist was in fine form, and played a long and arduous programme with brilliant success.

The Warrington Musical Society, conducted by Mr. Frank H. Crossley, will give the usual series of three Subscription Concerts, of which at the first, on November 6, Stanford's 'Phaudrig Crohoore' will be sung, and Mr. Naum Blinder will play the solo in Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto. On January 15, Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' will be performed, and at the third concert, on March 12, Haydn's 'Creation' (Parts I. and II.).

The choir of St. Mary's Church, Kirkdale, gave a concert on Tuesday evening, October 1, in the Lester Institute. The choruses sung by the full choir, included Fletcher's 'Reminiscences of Verdi,' Callcott's Fantasia on Gounod's 'Faust,' Elgar's 'It comes from the misty ages,' and Wagner's 'Faithful and True' from 'Lohengrin.' Mr. G. A. Jones had charge of the musical arrangements.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

In spite of a busy and complex industrial life, Manchester has in recent years cast off the reproach of being merely given over to the production of wealth, and has wisely followed the example of Flanders, Southern Germany, and Northern Italy in promoting learning and art alongside an unexampled trade development. In libraries, art-galleries, ably-conducted journals, Manchester is generously equipped and wisely guided, and this Autumn witnesses the beginning of another stage in the evolution of her musical enterprise. Not only do the Hallé and Gentlemen's series of concerts enter upon new phases of life, rich in promise, but, coincidently, determined attempts are being made to promote still further the growing taste for orchestral music. From October to March, Manchester (alone of all English centres outside the Metropolis) will enjoy two, and sometimes three, orchestral concerts weekly—and opera, chamber music, choral concerts, organ recitals, &c., all are eloquent of the same tendency to bring the greater public more and more into contact with the best in musical art.

About the middle of October Michael Balling took up his residence in our midst, and wasted no time in giving Manchester folk his views on the place of the Hallé Orchestra in the city's life, and what he considered should be the attitude adopted towards it and its work. In an interview he has asserted that modern music should more and more find a place in the Hallé programmes. Aware of the fact that in past years there has been a lack of enterprise in this direction, he holds it to be the bounden duty of an institution like the Hallé Concerts Society to be abreast of the times in which we live, and to produce such of the very best music of the composers of all nations as comes within the scope of these concerts. That this policy might entail financial loss did not disturb him or his views. Money must not stand in the way; he would go from door to door himself rather than that the work should fail. 'Good music,' he added, 'is a luxury which must be paid for, and the function of the Hallé Concerts is to educate public taste to appreciate music in its highest form, no matter at what cost,' and he had sufficient faith in Manchester folk to feel confident that the work upon which he had set his heart would never be allowed to lag behind for want of financial support. Related as Balling is by marriage to the family of the Hallé Society's treasurer, one may hope that his aspirations may be more fully realised than have been those of other ardent advocates of a forward policy. The week in which the first Hallé concert was given found Manchester occupied with the claims of Pavlova and Novikoff as well as the second week's work of the Quinlan Opera, whose management, with shrewd business instinct, sought to outshine the attractive power of Balling's première by producing Charpentier's 'Louise' in English for the first time in England. But it could not stand the test of juxtaposition with 'Tristan' and 'Walküre'—how doth the greater glory dim the less! As revealing the excellent material in this company, it is worth noting that there were only six pianoforte rehearsals and three orchestral ones for this performance, which was a really competent one; but it must be confessed that notwithstanding such capable treatment as it received at their hands, 'Louise' fell distinctly flat. At no time did it really grip the huge audience. The mounting was charming in every way. Mr. Tallis Vognera conducted, and Miss Boola, Miss Edna Thornton, Messrs. D'Oisley and Samuell played the chief characters.

This apart, the Quinlan visit has outvied the Denhof and even the previous Quinlan visits. The bigger the works they tackled the better the results, and the artistic merit was not of individuals but of all. Manchester opera-goers have never before heard singers of such pure and clear diction. Agnes Nicholls and John Coates have enormously increased their reputations; Robert Parker's work here, too, has had the seal of Manchester's approval set upon it in very definite manner. Indeed, it is quite true to say that he is probably the best English-singing Wotan we have to-day—not forgetting some excellent American Wagnerian singers.

Balling's first concert could not—and did not—arouse great enthusiasm; the two novelties introduced were a Serenade by Braunfels, and an 'Overture to a Gascon Tournament' by the Viennese, Richard Mandl. The orchestration in both is fluent and picturesque. Mandl, in a prefatory note to the score, writes: 'Some years ago, when reading an old story of which the hero was a Gascon Knight, the prototype of an enamoured, fantastically-minded braggart and blagueur, I got the idea of writing an orchestral work in the jovial, lyrical, extravagant style descriptive of this long-vanished tournament.' No doubt Balling has better things in store as the season advances.

In the adjoining Royal Borough of Salford the Municipality has provided her citizens with weekly Saturday evening concerts for the past ten years or so. In the initial stages they were regaled with light music, but with the advent of picture palaces and music halls, two houses nightly, the Corporation felt that competition along these lines was useless, and decided in favour of a trial of more classical music. It has proved an uphill fight and, faced with a serious deficit on the last Winter's working, it has been decided that this year each concert must stand on its own merits financially. During the coming season variety will be imparted by one or more dramatic Societies, the Salford Choral and the Manchester and Salford Tonic Sol-fa Societies also lending their aid.

Mr. Brand Lane believes in striking the public imagination. His opening Concert on October 12 brought Melba, Backhaus, and Ysäye on to the platform at once, and to these were added Edmund Burke and Mr. Lane's Choir. His first orchestral concert of the new series comes too late for comment in this issue.

Chamber-music, as usual in early October, has been prominent both for quantity and quality. The Brodsky Quartet have returned to their first love in the matter of a hall—that of the Royal Manchester College of Music, whose size and acoustics make it eminently suitable for such work. Were there any need to enforce such an elementary consideration as this, the spectacle of our spacious Free Trade Hall on the occasions of the visits of Busoni-Kreisler and of Bauer-Casals-Thibaud was an eloquent sight. Rows of empty front seats stretched away dismally to the cheaper places, where your genuine enthusiasts are always to be found. Even Beethoven's lovely E flat Trio cannot fight against such heavy odds. Better by far take a smaller room and have it crammed to suffocation than commit such an artistic crime.

Paderewski's recital on October 18, under the Harrison auspices, was his first visit for a few years, but there was no diminution in the fascination of his art. As usual, it was not until the Chopin section was reached that we got the real Paderewski—notably in the Funeral March Sonata.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

The Sunday Lecture Society are only including two musical evenings in their winter syllabus. Principal Hadow will lecture on 'Christmas Carols,' and Mr. Cecil Sharp on 'English Folk-songs and Dances.' The concert season was opened by a joint vocal recital, on October 9, by a well-known local lady, Madame Norman Snowball, and Mr. Robert Burnett, with whom she has recently been studying. In the course of a lengthy programme the former showed much advance in her style and musicianship. Paderewski appeared at the first Harrison Concert on October 15, and caused a mild sensation by introducing a novel feature into the Funeral March in Chopin's B flat minor Sonata. While scarcely at his best in such contrasted works as Bach's Organ Fantasia and Fugue in G minor and Chopin's Nocturne in G, he endued the first movement of the Chopin Sonata with immense tragic force, and entered into every changing mood of Schumann's 'Carneval.'

A meagre audience assembled to hear Kreisler and John McCormack on the Thursday of the same week. The programme was not weighty, but it was good and well-chosen, and the consummate artistry of the violinist made all the instrumental numbers a pure delight. On Monday, October 21, Madame Melba, accompanied by Backhaus, Szigeti, Mr. Edmund Burke, and M. Phillipe Gaubert, gave a concert.

Miss Margaret Fairless, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, the thirteen-year old violinist who was referred to in the Musical Times of last month, has just won admission to the Meisterschule in Vienna. Entrance to this Government-supported institution for the training of virtuosi is only obtained by competition, and only twelve students are permitted at one time. Even in that seat of violin virtuosity the honour is a coveted one, and only the most noteworthy compete. This promising English child is the youngest student ever admitted, and has studied for the last six months with Professor Sevcik. Her only other instruction was received from Mr. T. Walton Hardy, of Whitley Bay, with whom she had lessons for four years.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The inaugural Serial Meeting of the newly-formed Sheffield Musical Association was held in the Montgomery Hall on October 16. The Association sets up several objectives, all excellent, among them being gatherings, some of a social, others of a professional character; meetings for lectures, discussions, &c.; and a kind of 'concerts exchange,' where a list of dates and halls can be consulted so as to avoid clashing of concerts. Upwards of three hundred members have been enrolled. Sir Frederick Bridge was the lecturer. He prefaced his familiar lecture on 'Shakespeare and Music' with good wishes to the venture and a few characteristic witticisms concerning the amenities of musical people. Dr. Coward conducted a small choir and other illustrations were sung by Miss Eva Rich and Mr. Robert Charlesworth.

Among the suburban Churches, St. Cuthbert's shows leanings towards musical enterprise. A flourishing Choral Society has recently been formed, conducted by Mrs. W. Simpson. Two concerts were given, at which well-prepared performances of Leoni's 'The Gate of Life,' and the new concert-version of Gounod's 'Faust' were performed.

Sunday oratorio performances are popular religious activities. In the category may be recorded well-attended performances of Haydn's 'The Creation' (at Petre Street Church, directed by Mr. P. Partridge), and 'Elijah,' at Victoria Hall (Mr. H. C. Jackson, conductor).

The Albert Hall organ, a fine Cavaillé-Coll instrument, is highly regarded by Sheffield organ-lovers. Two recitals by M. Joseph Bonnet, the gifted organist of the Church of St. Eustache, Paris, gave evident pleasure to large audiences.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

Calgary (Alberta).—A graceful ceremony of unusual significance took place on September 6, upon a platform erected outside the City Hall, at Calgary, the occasion being a presentation of diplomas and certificates by H.R.H. The Duke of Connaught to the successful candidates in the Associated Board examinations, numbering over 120, of all grades from Primary to Licentiate. His Royal Highness was received by Dr. A. O. MacRae, honorary representative of the Associated Board, and Mrs. Glen Broder.

Cambridge.—Dr. C. B. Rootham has been appointed to succeed Dr. Alan Gray as conductor of the University Musical Society. An interesting series of chamber and recital concerts is announced.

Christchurch (N.Z.).—The Musical Union opened its season on August 6, under the direction of Mr. W. S. King, the new conductor. The readings given of Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' overture and other instrumental numbers, Iliffe's 'Softly the moonlight is shed,' and other part-songs gave evidence of his high ability. Solo contributions were made by Miss Louise Croucher (violinist) and Miss D. Parsons (vocalist).

Folkestone.—The Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. F. E. Fletcher, announce Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' and Elgar's 'King Olaf' and 'Bavarian Highlands' for the 1912-13 season. Ashford Choral Society have undertaken 'A tale of Old Japan.'

Hanley.—An interesting and varied concert was given by the Potteries Choral Society, at Victoria Hall, on October 17, the most distinguished feature of the proceedings being perhaps the organ playing of Mr. Alfred Hollins, who played Mozart's Fantasia in F minor, his own Nocturne and Concert Rondo, and other works in a way that gave universal satisfaction. His 'Dartside' was sung by the ladies' voices of the choir to good effect, and the full choir was heard in German's 'The three Knights,' Elliot Button's 'Allan Water,' Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer' (soloist, Miss Gertrude Perry), and Montague Phillips's 'O tender sleep.' The high standard of the performers did credit to the singers and to their conductor, Mr. Carl Oliver. The other soloists were Mr. W. T. Bonner (pianoforte), and Miss Dorothy Knight.

Mountain Ash.—An excellent performance of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' followed by a miscellaneous programme, was given by the Mountain Ash Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. T. W. Millar, at the Pavilion, on October 17. The solo parts were taken by Miss Ada Forrest, Madame Reynolds-Davies, and Mr. Ivor Walters. Violin solos were given by Mr. Stephen Evans.

Nevis (B.C.).—At a concert given by the Philharmonic Society on September 9, a new pianoforte acquired by the Society was formally opened by Miss Hollings. Popular selections were given by the orchestra, and the one choral item was Webb's 'Glorious Apollo.' There were many contributions by individual artists, including the Soldiers' Chorus from Gounod's 'Faust' as a pianoforte solo.

Oldham.—The Musical Society, conducted by Mr. Harry Brooks, has chosen Gounod's 'Faust,' Mendelssohn's 'Walpurgis Night' and 'Hymn of Praise' for performance during the present season.

Mr. Thomas Whitney Surette gave an interesting lecture on Beethoven at Æolian Hall on October 10, discussing the Waldstein Sonata in particular as illustrative of Beethoven's genius. On October 17 the subject was Brahms, and the Trio Op. 101 was chosen in illustration.

Foreign Notes.

ANTWERP.

M. Emile Wambach has been appointed principal of the Conservatoire, in succession to the late Jan Blockx.——The season of the Flemish Theatre was inaugurated on October 3, with a revival of Jan Blockx's last opera, 'Liefdelied.'

BÂLE.

Among the works to be performed for the first time at the Symphony Concerts of the 'Allgemeine Musikalische Gesellschaft' (conductor, Herr Hermann Suter) are Max Reger's 'Concerto in the old style,' the 'Kindertotenlieder' by Mahler, Klose's 'Elfenreigen,' Richard Strauss's Symphony in F minor, Sinigaglia's Suite Piemonte, Chausson's Symphony in B flat, an 'Intermezzo-guerriero and funerale' by Hans von Bülow, a Pianoforte concerto by Braunfels, Hans Huber's Symphony in C major, Bruckner's Symphony in E major, and Alexander Ritter's symphonic episode 'Kaiser Rudolphs Ritt zum Grabe.'

BERLIN.

An interesting programme of old music is announced for the four concerts to be given by the 'Neue Berliner Tonkünstlerinnen Orchester' (conductor, Herr Iwan Froebe). Among the compositions included are Handel's Concerto grosso in F major, a Cantata for alto and string orchestra by Johann Christian Bach, Suite movements by B. Practorius, some numbers from J. S. Bach's 'Musikalisches Opfer' and his sixth 'Brandenburg' Concerto, two 'Divertimenti a due violini e basso' and a 'Sinfonia Burlesca' by Leopold Mozart, Corelli's Concerto grosso No. 8, a Trio for flute, bassoon, and violoncello with cembalo accompaniment by Fr. W. Zachow, a Cantata for a bass solo by J. P. Krieger, an Orchestral Suite by G. P. Telemann, and three pieces for string orchestra by Henry Purcell.——Wolf-Ferrari's 'Susannen's Geheimnis' was recently performed for the first time in Berlin at the Kurfürsten Oper. On the same occasion Franz von Suppé's now rarely-heard light opera 'Die schöne Galatea' was revived.——On September 26 Mr. Frederick Stock, the conductor of the Thomas Orchestra in Chicago, U.S.A., directed a concert of his own compositions at the Philharmonie. The programme contained a Symphony in C minor, a symphonic sketch, 'An einem Sommerabend,' Symphonic waltzes, and Festival-march on American folk-melodies and the American National hymn 'The star-spangled banner.'——Another artist domiciled in Chicago, Mr. Wilhelm Middelschulte, gave an organ recital at the Blüthner Saal on September 27, when he established his position among performers of the front rank. Besides works by Bach, his programme included a transcription of Busoni's 'Fantasia contrapuntistica' (on Bach's 'Kunst der Fuge') and Liszt's Fantasy and Fugue on the chorale 'Ad nos ad salutarem undam.'——The first concert of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde took place on September 30. Herr Fritz Steinbach has been engaged as conductor in place of Herr Oscar Fried, and under his direction a fine performance was secured of Mahler's first Symphony.——Hugo Kaun's symphonic-poem, 'Am Rhein,' and a Symphony in C major, by Paul Dukas, were heard for the first time at a concert conducted by Mr. Theodore Spiering.——Two cantatas by Bach, viz., 'Mien liebster Jesus ist verloren' and 'Sehet, wir gehen hinauf nach Jerusalem,' and Verdi's interesting 'Quattro pessi sacri' formed the programme of the first concert of the Philharmonischer Chor (conductor, Professor Siegfried Ochs).——An interesting String Quartet by Ernst Joch was introduced at the first concert of the Petri Quartet.——Hegar's choral ballads, 'Totenvolk' and 'Rudolf von Werdeberg,' and Max Bruch's Scenes from 'Frithjof's Saga,' were included in the programme of the first concert of the Berliner Liederkranz.——The Kestenberg Trio recently gave a fine interpretation of Max Reger's Trio in E minor, Op. 102.——The outstanding feature of the first Philharmonic Concert (conductor, Professor Arthur Nikisch) was a magnificent performance of Richard Strauss's tone-poem 'Also sprach Zarathustra.' Madame Ottilie Metzger sang three of Mahler's 'Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen' (with orchestra).——Elgar's Overture 'In the South' was played at a concert conducted by Professor Rudolf Buck.——The first of the special Weingartner concerts to be given at Fürstenwalde (fifty-eight kilometres from Berlin, and therefore eight kilometres beyond the reach of the special law with which Herr Weingartner is honoured) took place with great success, the public (brought down in three special trains) transforming the occasion into an unmistakable demonstration of sympathy.——On October 16, Arnold Schönberg's newest work, 'Lieder des Pierrot Lunaire,' was produced. It is music to twenty-one spoken poems, selected from Albert Giraud's 'Lieder des Pierrot Lunaire,' excellently translated by Otto Erich Hartleben. The work is scored for a reciting voice on different notes, pianoforte, flute, piccolo, clarinet, bass-clarinet, violin, viola, and violoncello. It abounds in the most extraordinary sounds, and is said to exceed Schönberg's previous works in 'advancement.' Serious critics state, however, that it made an absolutely novel (if somewhat baffling) impression.——Caruso has made his now annual appearance at the Royal Opera, with enormous success.

BREMEN.

During the operatic season which commenced on September 1, two novelties, the comic operas 'Das heisse Eisen,' by Max Wolff, and Theodor Blumer's 'Der Fünfuhrthee,' have been given with considerable success.——Among the works to be performed at the twelve Symphony Concerts of the Philharmonische Gesellschaft (conductor, Herr Ernst Wendel) are Bruckner's ninth Symphony, Hugo Kaun's Symphony No. 2, Reger's 'Concerto in the olden style,' Debussy's 'Iberia,' Boehe's 'Tragic overture,' Hans Pfitzner's Christelflein Overture, 'Baba Jaga,' for chorus and orchestra, by Liadoff, 'Sonnenhymnus,' by Wilhelm Berger, and Berlioz's oratorio 'The Childhood of Christ.'

BRUNSWICK.

A new two-act opera, 'Das Buch Hiob,' composed by Willy Schäffer to the libretto of Leopold Adler (an adaptation of Hermann Höltz's play), was produced at the Court Theatre on October 6.

BRUSSELS.

Massenet's 'Thaïs' and Bruneau's interesting 'L'attaque du Moulin' have recently been revived at the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie.

CASSEL.

Under the direction of Herr Zulauf, Wolf-Ferrari's opera, 'The jewels of the Madonna,' was recently performed for the first time at the Court Theatre with considerable success.

COLOGNE.

Alfred Kaiser's opera, 'Stella Maris,' was given for the first time at the Opera House. The work proved interesting, and was well received.

DESSAU.

During this season the following works will be given for the first time: The 'Maien Königin,' generally attributed to Gluck; Berlioz's 'Benvenuto Cellini'; 'Der Cid,' by Peter Cornelius; 'Der Nothemd,' by V. v. Woikowsky-Biedau; 'Barbarina,' by Otto Neitzel, and Richard Strauss's 'Ariadne auf Naxos.'

DORTMUND.

The twenty-fifth anniversary of the foundation of the Philharmonic Orchestra was celebrated on October 5 and 6, when a popular concert and two Festival concerts were given. Under the direction of its founder, Professor Georg Hüttner, the orchestra played Reger's Variations on a theme by Johann Adam Hiller, Haydn's 'Symphonie Concertante,' Mozart's 'Pariser' Overture, Gernsheim's tone-poem 'Zu einem Drama' and symphonic-poem 'Seemorgen,' and the 'Glockenlieder' by Max Schillings.

DRESDEN.

The outstanding feature of the season's musical life has been the celebrations of the fortieth anniversary of Herr Ernst von Schuch's appointment as conductor of the Royal Opera. On September 21 he conducted a special Festival concert at the Opera House, re-opened for the occasion, and was assisted by Mesdames Eva Plaschke von der Osten and Wittich, and Messrs. Walter Soomer, Karl Perron, Jan Kubelik, Eugen d'Albert, and Dr. Richard Strauss. On the following day a special performance of Wagner's 'Die Meistersinger' was given under Herr von Schuch's direction. The same morning a formal celebration took place on the stage of the Opera in the presence of the entire staff of the Royal Opera. Eighteen speeches were delivered, and the King conferred one of the highest decorations on the artist, who was also presented with a cheque for £5,000, collected by his admirers, as well as with innumerable mementoes.——The Town Council has conferred an annual pension of £150 on the composer Felix Draeseke, on the occasion of his seventy-seventh birthday.——A new work by Max Reger, entitled 'Romantische Suite,' was successfully produced under the direction of Herr von Schuch at the first Symphony concert of the Königliche Kapelle.

ERFURT.

Under the auspices of the Erfurter Männergesangverein (conductor, Herr Josef Thienel) a Festival devoted to compositions by Friedrich Hegar took place on October 5 and 6. Among the compositions performed were the ballad for tenor and baritone solo, male chorus, and orchestra, 'Das Herz von Douglas,' the Violin concerto in D major, and the oratorio 'Manasse.'

FRANKFURT.

At the first Museumsconcert, Max Reger's 'Concerto in the olden style' was produced with great success under the direction of Herr Willem Mengelberg. The work—somewhat in the style of Handel's 'Concerti grossi' and Bach's 'Brandenburg' Concertos—seems likely to become a permanent addition to the répertoire.

HAMBURG.

Under the direction of Dr. Georg Göhler, the Leipsic Riedelverein and the orchestra of the Verein Hamburgischer Musikfreunde performed Mahler's eighth Symphony for the first time.——On October 19, the new Michaeliskirche was inaugurated in the presence of the German Emperor. The firm of E. F. Walcker et Cie. has supplied the organ, which is said to be the biggest in the world. The instrument, built in accordance with the ideas of the well-known organist, Herr Alfred Sittard, contains 163 speaking stops distributed over five manuals and pedals. The pipes number over twelve thousand.——Humperdinck's opera, 'Die Königskinder, has been given for the first time at the Opera House, the work being excellently received.

LAUSANNE.

The following works will be heard at the sixteen subscription concerts to be given by the Symphony Orchestra (conductor, M. Carl Ehrenberg): Duparc's 'Leonore,' Ravel's 'Ma mère l'Oie,' Tchaikovsky's 'Manfred' Symphony, Bruckner's Symphony in D minor, the Prelude to the second Act of 'Ingwelde,' by Max Schillings, Max Reger's Variations on a theme by Johann Adam Hiller, Debussy's Nocturnes, a Scherzo by Chaix, 'Scènes d'hiver' by Denéréaz, Lalo's Symphony in G minor, Glazounoff's sixth Symphony, the Overture 'La Grande Pâque russe,' by Rimsky-Korsakoff, the Prelude and Intermezzo from the opera 'Der Corregidor,' by Hugo Wolf, Hans Pfitzner's 'Christelflein,' and Stavenhagen's second Pianoforte concerto.

LEIPSIC.

The seven-hundredth anniversary of the foundation of the Thomasschule has naturally formed the occasion for many musical celebrations. Under the direction of Professor Gustav Schreck a great concert was given at the Thomaskirche, the programme containing only compositions by former Thomascantors, including Joh. Seb. Bach, Georg Rhau, Seth Calvisius, Joh. Hermann Schein, Joh. Schelle, Joh. Kuhnau, Eb. Müller, G. Schicht, Fr. Doles, Th. Weinlig, Moritz Hauptmann, E. Fr. Richter, and W. Rust.——The Opera gave a special performance of the comic opera, 'Die Jagd,' by Johann Adam Hiller, another old Thomascantor and conductor of the Gewandhaus Concerts.——The first two Gewandhaus programmes contained, besides well-known works, Haydn's cantata for alto solo, 'Ariadne auf Naxos,' Beethoven's 'Adelaide,' orchestrated by Arnold Schönberg, and Volkmann's Serenade in D minor for string orchestra.

LYONS.

The following works are promised for the first time at the Grand Theatre: Vincent d'Indy's 'Fervaal'; 'Don Quichotte,' by Massenet; Sylvio Lazzari's 'Le Lépreuse'; 'Le trois masques,' by Isidore de Lara; 'Sous les scelles,' by Leo Blech; 'Le Bonhomme Jadis,' by Jaques-Dalcroze; Moussorgsky's 'Boris Godounoff'; and the ballets, 'Ma mère l'Oye,' by Maurice Ravel, and 'Milenka,' by Jan Blockx.

MILAN.

An interesting programme has been devised for the coming season of grand opera at the Scala Theatre. Among the works to be performed are Schumann's Scenes from Goethe's 'Faust' (presented on the stage for the first time), Richard Strauss's 'Feuersnot' and 'Salome,' 'Habanera,' by Raoul Laparra, Verdi's 'Don Carlos,' Weber's 'Oberon' (never before played in Italy), 'Le Donne curiose,' by Wolf-Ferrari, 'L'Amore dei tre Re,' by Montemezzi, Puccini's 'Fanciulla del West,' and Bellini's 'Norma.' The répertoire will of course include also such well-known works as 'Lohengrin.' 'Carmen,' and 'Cavalleria Rusticana.'

MUNICH.

Herr Franz Fischer, the well-known Wagnerian conductor, has retired from his appointment at the Opera. He was one of the few remaining pupils and collaborators of the master who still maintain the direct tradition.

OSTEND.

Among the works heard at the concerts of the Kursaal orchestra (conductor, M. Leon Rinskopf) have been Victor Buffin's symphonic-poem 'Lovelace,' the 'Marche joyeuse' by Chabrier, Saint-Saëns's third Symphony (with organ), in C minor, the Swedish Rhapsody, 'Midsommervaka,' by Hugo Alfven, and Elgar's 'Enigma Variations,' which earned high critical opinion.

PARIS.

Reger's opera 'Sigurd,' Reynaldo Hahn's ballet, 'La Fête chez Thérèse,' Giordano's 'Siberia,' Massenet's 'Roma' and 'Thaïs,' and Richard Strauss's 'Salome' have recently figured in the répertoire of the Grand Opéra.——The season at the Théâtre Lyrique de la Gaité was inaugurated with Massenet's 'Hérodiade,' given for the hundredth time. Shortly afterwards the management revived Mozart's 'Magic Flute.' ——The Colonne Concerts (conductor, M. Gabriel Pierné) commenced their activities on October 13. In memory of Massenet his 'Erinnyes' and fragments of the oratorio 'Marie-Magdeleine' were given. The programme also included Vincent d'Indy's 'Jour d'été à la montagne' and Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Capriccio espagnol.'

ST. PETERSBURG.

Many interesting works figure in the prospectus issued by the management of the Siloti Concerts. Mahler's 'Kindertotenlieder,' the 'Dramatic Scherzo' by Julie Weisberg, 'Le joli feu de fôret' by Roger-Ducasse, Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, Ravel's 'Valses nobles et sentimentales,' fragments from 'Saint-Sébastien' and other compositions by Debussy, a Suite, 'Au soleil,' by Wassilenko, several smaller works by Liadoff, Arnold Schönberg's 'Pelleas and Melisande,' and Scriabine's first Symphony and the tone-poem 'Promethée' are to be heard. A special concert to commemorate the thirtieth anniversary of M. Glazounoff's débût as composer will also take place, and there will be a number of extra concerts, to be conducted by Messrs. Nikisch, Ernst von Schuch, and Albert Coates.

SCHWERIN.

A Festival devoted to French music took place on October 12-15. Two operatic performances (Février's 'Monna Vanna,' and 'Manon,' by Massenet) and three concerts were given. At the first of these only compositions by César Franck were played, including the Symphony in D minor, 'Variations symphoniques' for pianoforte and orchestra (soloist, M. Raoul Pugno), and part of the 'Beatitudes.' Modern French chamber-music (String quartet by Debussy, Fauré's Pianoforte quartet, and a Violin sonata by Saint-Saëns) formed the programme of the second concert, while Alberic Magnard's third Symphony (performed for the first time in Germany), Vincent d'Indy's 'Wallenstein' Symphony, Debussy's 'L'après-midi d'un Faune,' the Scherzo, 'L'apprenti sorcier,' by Paul Dukas, and Théodore Dubois's Violin concerto, excellently played by M. Henri Marteau, were given at the third concert. The conductor of the Festival was Herr Willibald Kaehler.

SONDERSHAUSEN.

Under the auspices of the Liszt Gesellschaft, a Liszt Festival was organized and took place on September 21 and 22. Two orchestral concerts in the Court Theatre and one concert in Trinitatiskirche were arranged. Besides Liszt's symphonic-poem, 'Ce q'on entend sur le montagne,' some songs, including 'Das düstere Meer' and 'Der Gang um Mitternacht' for male choir, the Pianoforte sonata in B minor, and fragments from 'Saint Elisabeth,' Bruckner's String quintet, a Ballade for orchestra by E. E. Taubert, Max Schillings's incidental music to the 'Eleusische Fest,' a sacred solo cantata, 'Ich Herr lass deine liebe Engelein,' by Franz Junker, and Alexander Ritter's 'In solus sanctus' (for soprano solo, organ, violin, and pianoforte) were performed.

STRASSBURG.

Elgar's first Symphony in A flat, Busoni's Pianoforte concerto with male chorus, Novak's symphonic-poem 'In der Tatra,' and 'Prélude à l'Hymne à la Beauté,' by V. Tommasini, are to be given for the first time at the concerts of the Municipal Orchestra (conductor, Herr Hans Pfitzner).

VIENNA.

Dr. Ethel Smyth's works for chorus and orchestra, 'Sleepless dreams' and 'Hey nonny no,' are to be performed in German at the Singakademie on November 3.

WEIMAR.

Under the direction of Herr Peter Raabe, Richard Strauss's 'Der Rosenkavalier' was performed for the first time at the Court Opera with great success.

Miscellaneous.

The first International Congress of Musical Pedagogues is to be held in Berlin immediately after Easter, 1913. The work of the Congress will be divided into the following sections: I. General educational and scholastic questions. II. Social and professional questions. III. Deliberations concerning the reorganization of the musical training institutes. IV. New researches and results, scientific as well as practical, in the province of the art of singing. V. Reforms concerning the teaching of singing in high schools and board schools. The teaching of music in preparatory academies and in training colleges. VI. Special questions connected with the technique and method of the pianoforte and of string instruments. All inquiries from those desiring to read papers should be addressed without delay, at latest by November 1,* to the Business Committee Rooms of the German Association of Musical Pedagogues, 5, Lutherstreet, Berlin, W.62.

The following Scholarships at the Royal Academy of Music are open for competition: The Sainton Scholarship for violinists of either sex (the competition to be held about January 3); the Broughton Packer Bath Scholarship for violinists of either sex who are British subjects, and the Broughton Packer Bath Scholarships for male violoncellists who are British subjects (the competitions to be held about December 12); the George Mence Smith Scholarship for male singers who have never been students of the Royal Academy of Music (competition to be held about January 3). The following awards have been made: The Baume (Manx) Scholarship to Marguerite E. Morton; the Ada Lewis Scholarships to Arthur Phillips (organ), Giovanni B. Barbirolli (violoncello), Evangeline Livens, Gwendda D. O. Davies (pianoforte); the Campbell Clarke Scholarship (singing) to Dorothy F. Simpson; the Stainer Exhibition (organ) to Dudley E. Poll.

* The communication to us is dated October 3, and therefore could not appear before our November number.

Mr. Sterling MacKinlay is forming an Operatic Society, which will meet for rehearsal on Wednesday evenings. Public performances will be given from time to time, and while at first only light opera will be undertaken, it is proposed later on to include excerpts from grand opera in the programmes. Rehearsals of Edward German's 'Merrie England' will commence shortly. Applications for membership should be addressed to the Secretary, 32, Baker Street, W.

The South Place Sunday Concerts are again in full swing, having started on October 6 with a Beethoven concert; on October 13, Ravel's String Quartet in F was played by the Langley-Mukle Quartet; on October 20, the London String Quartet had undertaken to contribute to an interesting programme. Future arrangements are on the same enterprising lines, and it is to be hoped that the committee's appeal for support will be listened and responded to.

An impressive list of musical arrangements has been issued by the Royal Victoria Hall (the 'Old Vic.') for the Autumn and Winter. Every Thursday evening (except Boxing-Day) until January 30 will be devoted to music. There are concerts with well-known artists and, more frequently, costume recitals of favourite operas. The series is to be continued after January. The choir and orchestra number fifty, and Mr. Charles Corri is the conductor.

The annual Brass Band Festival took place at the Crystal Palace on September 28. In the championship section the test was from Rossini's 'William Tell,' and the result as follows: 1st, St. Hilda Colliery (Durham); 2nd, Irwell Springs; 3rd, Foden's Motor Works. All three bands were conducted by Mr. W. Halliwell. In the various competitions of the day there were over 200 competing bands.

The Chaplin Trio announce a concert of Shakespearean and 17th and 18th century music at Æolian Hall on November 9. The programme will include Bach's Triple Concerto, to be played on three harpsichords with string accompaniment by Mrs. George Cornwallis-West, Mr. W. Wostenholme, and Miss Nellie Chaplin, and many interesting numbers of varied character.

The first concert of the 'Schumann Season' announced by the London Trio takes place at Æolian Hall on November 18. The appointment of Signor Simonetti as violin professor at the Royal Irish Academy of Music, Dublin, necessitates his retirement from the Trio, and his place will be taken by Mr. Louis Pécskai. Professor Whitehouse remains as violoncellist and Madame Amina Goodwin as pianist.

The ninth annual competition for the Charles Phillips (late Elkin) Singing Scholarships took place at Bechstein Hall recently. There were ninety-six competitors, and the judges, Madame Ada Crossley and Mr. Thorpe Bates, awarded the scholarships to Marjorie Glover (Chorley Wood) and Francis Bates (Kilburn).

A Beethoven Festival is to be given at Edinburgh on February 25, 26, 27 and 28 and March 1, 1913, with the co-operation of the Hallé Orchestra, the Edinburgh Royal Choral Union, and Mr. Michael Balling. The programmes of the five concerts are planned to include all the symphonies.

Elgar's 'Caractacus' is to be performed by the Kirkcaldy and Dundee Choral Union this Winter, under the direction of Mr. Charles M. Cowe.

Answers to Correspondents.

L. L.—Your instances are, in general, correct. But they foreshadow rather than anticipate the innovations of Wagner. The work of all great reformers in every branch of life could be similarly discounted.

Simpson.—We recommend for Chopin's Nocturne in E flat (Op. 48, No. 1): Lento, ♩=112; Poco più lento, ♩=80; Doppio movimento, ♩=132.

Diapason.—'Organ-playing,' by Dr. Percy Buck (Macmillan & Co., price 4s.) would suit your purpose well.

DR. ARNE
AND RULE, BRITANNIA
BY WILLIAM HAYMAN CUMMINGS.

PREFACE.

The glorious National Song, "Rule, Britannia," is familiar to the whole British race; nevertheless, very few men and women are acquainted with the history of its birth and parentage.

In the following pages I have endeavoured to chronicle all the facts which are discoverable by diligent research, and to present them in an attractive and entertaining manner.

The life of Dr. Arne, the composer of "Rule, Britannia," offers to the reader and to the music student an interesting and instructive story, showing that natural ability, even when combined with genius, is not sufficient to ensure a triumphant and successful career. Morality and conscientious rectitude in the affairs of life are essential, and had Arne exercised these, his exceptional gifts might have enabled him to surpass his great contemporary, Handel.

It only remains to be noted that many letters and documents are here printed for the first time, some of them copied from the original autographs in my possession. They illuminate much which has hitherto been obscure and uncertain in the career of a famous composer.

NEW EDITION NOW READY.
THE SUCCESSFUL LENT CANTATA

GETHSEMANE TO GOLGOTHA

The Libretto by YORKE CHESTER is divided into Three Parts—

1. IN THE GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE; 2. BEFORE PILATE'S HOUSE; 3. AT THE FOOT OF THE CROSS;

These scenes being suggested by Montgomery's Hymn, the three verses of which, commencing "Go to dark Gethsemane," "Follow to the Judgment-Hall," and "Calvary's Mournful Mountain Climb"—sung as a chorale by the choir—respectively commence the three parts of the Cantata, which will be found to be so pictorially and dramatically constructed as to enlist the attention and sympathies of both Choir and Congregation. Each part concludes with a short selection from the Litany to be said by the Officiating Minister and the Congregation, together with a Hymn.

The Music by EDMUND TURNER

Is one of the best examples of this composer's work, combining extreme effectiveness with a comparative absence of difficulties, so that time spent at rehearsals is always profitably employed and not wasted in overcoming tasks which are of no effect even when conquered.

PRICE, 1S. 6D. TONIC SOL-FA, 1S. WORDS ONLY, 3S. PER 100.

A Specimen Copy of the above will be sent to any Clergyman, Choirmaster, Organist, or Conductor (please mention church or appointment) for six stamps.

Dear Mr. Chester,

I hear that it is your intention further to develop the business in connection with your Circulating Music Library.

In wishing you every success in that undertaking, it gives me much pleasure to say how complete and admirable upon all occasions I have found your Library, as well as your stock of music. Indeed your business has always seemed to me to lack nothing that any musician or student could possibly require.

Believe me, yours faithfully,
(Signed) W. KUHE.

5, Clifton Road, Brighton,
September 8, 1903.

Dear Mr. Chester,

In returning the Music you were kind enough to send me on selection, I cannot help saying a few words about your Music Library, and being the doyen of the Musical profession in Brighton, I hope it will not be arrogant in me, if I speak as the representative of the profession.

My experience is mostly with Music for String Instruments and for the Orchestra; and in that direction your Lending Library has done great things for us. It has enabled Conductors to attempt works, and the public to enjoy them, which it would have been very difficult and very expensive to procure without your help. The completeness of the Library is quite astonishing, and whether we wanted a Haydn Symphony or a Tchaikowsky, a Mozart or a Brahms, they were equally at our disposal, and so it was with Chamber Music.

I can only hope that you have been repaid for the labour and thought you must have given to this matter, and that it has been as profitable to you as it has been beneficial to us professors and the public.—Yours very truly, (Signed) LEOP. STERN.

Dear Mr. Chester,

If the testimony of an obscure amateur is of any use, I am very glad indeed to assure anyone who reads this, that for completeness, advantages, and low subscription, no other musical lending library I know can compare with yours; and I have tried some of the best in London, Vienna, Berlin, Paris, Moscow, and other great musical centres. No matter what music I want, and I have generally required the newest, foreign, and least-known works, you hand it me at once from your wonderful store, or procure it for me with a promptness that I have never experienced elsewhere.

Yours faithfully,
ERNEST E. CHANT.

Dear Mr. Chester,

Since you deem my testimony of value, it gives me great pleasure to bear witness to the remarkable comprehensiveness of your stock of music.

Your ability to supply me at once with the latest compositions, Continental as well as British, has often surprised me, and on several occasions been of great service, when away from home.

Yours truly,
(Signed) F. GILBERT WEBB.

Feb. 28, 1905.

Dear Mr. Chester,

I duly received the parcel, and am glad that you have at last triumphed over the sleepy publishers.

I take this opportunity of thanking you for the way in which you have, during the last 24 years, always succeeded in supplying me with admirable promptitude and usually from stock—with the most out-of-the-way compositions by all sorts of foreign composers. It would have been a shame if these people had broken down your record!

That you may long be spared to prosecute your business successfully is the hearty wish of

Yours very faithfully,
(Signed) F. CORDER.

Extract from letter received from the late Dr. F. J. Sawyer, F.R.C.O.:—

"My London friends envy me, because, thanks to your enterprise, I know all the newest music long before they do . . . with your extraordinary stock and your complete lending library, Brighton musicians ought to be the best read in the country. Let me then discharge some of the great debt of 'musical gratitude' that I owe you."

17, Cathcart Road,
South Kensington, S.W., June 15, 1904.

Dear Mr. Chester,

I should like to be allowed to express my admiration of the skill, tact, knowledge, and promptitude which have enabled you to make so great a success of your Circulating Music Library. Your enterprise in always securing the latest important compositions published abroad, as well as at home, is so remarkable that my friends and I are accustomed to speak of Brighton as the most likely part of London and its suburbs in which to obtain anything in the way of music that is more than usually new or uncommon.

In the hope that your valuable services may long continue available to the musical public,

I am, dear Mr. Chester,
Very faithfully yours,
(Signed) EDGAR F. JACQUES.

1, Norfolk Crescent,

My dear Mr. Chester,

I must write and compliment you upon your admirable and wonderfully comprehensive Musical Library, which seems quite unique and is kept thoroughly up to date.

All the most recent publications are there—English, French, German, Russian, Italian.

The music lover who resides at Brighton has certainly reason to be grateful to you for providing him with such excellent musical fare.

As one who has partaken of this fare, I have much pleasure in expressing to you the delight I have experienced.

Believe me,
Yours sincerely,

THE

ODE

BY

ARTHUR O'SHAUGHNESSY

SET TO MUSIC

FOR CONTRALTO SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

EDWARD ELGAR

(OP. 69).

Price Two Shillings and Sixpence.

Paper Boards, 3s.; Cloth, 4s.; Vocal Parts, 1s. each; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s. 6d.

THE TIMES.

It is a setting of the Ode by Arthur O'Shaughnessy beginning "We are the music makers, and we are the dreamers of dreams," which extols the artist spirit as the motive power of human action. The words are of a kind to appeal strongly to such a mind as Elgar's and to bring from him music which makes a very direct appeal to the sympathy of his audience. The personal interpretation of the words given by the frequent quotations from his own earlier works no doubt heightens this appeal at the moment, and serves to secure an immediate acceptance for the work.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The music is often of exquisite beauty, . . . the Ode represents Elgar in the highest development of his creative faculty.

MORNING POST.

To illustrate the story of those who have inspired the music the composer draws from his own works, his quotations from himself being made with considerable subtlety. As in the case of a play founded upon a novel, it is necessary to know the original to appreciate its application, but as Elgar's music is now well known there is no difficulty on the part of the hearers. . . . The use made of familiar themes is happy, but nowhere is it so successfully made as at that portion where the soloist enters to describe the ignorance of the singers as to the effect of their work. Here the theme of the Nimrod number from the Enigma Variations is used, and, as reinforced by the chorus, the effect is very striking. Though using recognisable matter, the composer employs it in the best manner, and he works this section up to a mighty climax.

DAILY NEWS.

The whole is full of characteristic Elgarian beauty and ample contrasts. It is more easily intelligible at a first hearing than any of his important recent works, and its instant popularity would seem to be assured.

DAILY EXPRESS.

There is not a great deal of music, melodically speaking, in the swing of the lines, and after writing one wholly beautiful theme—a theme that is constantly recurring, if never with quite the same alluring appeal as when it is first heard in the orchestra—the composer continues on his way with a wealth of harmonic colour and forceful rhetoric.

DAILY MAIL.

"The Music Makers," Sir Edward Elgar's new choral ode, touches none of the depths of the composer's really memorable achievements excepting by the way of direct quotation. Yet it deserves, and will win, popular favour and many performances because of its fluent grace and beautifully accomplished workmanship.

Sir Edward Elgar is nowadays in the completest possession of his style of technical accomplishments. He can compose those glowing Elgarian harmonies, that rich orchestral colouring, whether he has or has not a considerable motive behind, just as Bach wrote counterpoint.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

The brief prelude is full of that mystic atmosphere which Elgar knows so well how to produce, and the hushed entry of the chorus in some simple phrases is also very exquisite in effect. Then I think the music flags just a little until we come to a passage where the chorus sings (in ancient mode) of Nineveh, and the orchestra has a fine theme of swinging rhythm, suggesting an irresistible onward force.

Some of the finest music in the work begins with the entry of a contralto solo, "They had no vision amazing," sung to phrases of much imagination. . . . A fine climax, picturing "the infinite morning," is fashioned out of the big theme of the first Symphony, and soon the contralto voice enters again with a long solo of great emotional power and beauty. The ending brings once more the hushed mystic atmosphere with which the work opened.

FIFINE AT THE FAIR

(A DEFENCE OF INCONSTANCY).

AN ORCHESTRAL DRAMA

WITH A PROLOGUE

(AFTER BROWNING).

COMPOSED BY

GRANVILLE BANTOCK.

MINIATURE SCORE.

Price Five Shillings. Cloth, 7s. 6d.

Orchestral Parts, MS.

THE TIMES.

It is indeed a remarkably brilliant piece of work of its kind, and is one which it is easy to appreciate. . . . We have first a delicate prologue for strings which directly pictures the sensations described in Browning's "Amphibian," then a delightfully humorous scene of the Fair, then music intended to contrast the characters of Fifine and Elvire. . . . He never seems at a loss for a moment, and if his drama is apt to call up recollections of modern Italian opera, all the devices serve him well, because they convey certain ideas in a direct way to his audience.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Superbly put together, and invented and scored by a truly masterly hand, Bantock has not given us for many days a work so likely to bring worshippers to the shrine of his great and here genial talent.

STANDARD.

Mr. Granville Bantock's musical counterpart to Browning's "Fifine at the Fair" is quite the best thing that he has given us. He is never at a loss for a happy phrase, never nonplussed for want of right shade of colour. His music is realistic—splendidly and convincingly so in the Fair scene—objective and subjective; picturesque, sensuous and strong. In the more introspective passages his instruments moralise with singular eloquence. The clash of emotion—there is no need to dwell upon the cause, since Browning is an open book to all—is handled with masterly effect. . . It is delightful music, and good hearing from beginning to end.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

Mr. Bantock's orchestral drama, "Fifine at the Fair," is a brilliant contribution to English orchestral literature, original and modern in its ideas and masterly in its orchestral treatment of these. The music is founded upon Browning's poem of the same name, and is divided into a prologue, drama, and epilogue (as in the poem). The first section has given Mr. Bantock an opportunity for his fine powers of musical characterization, and the themes illustrating the nature of the three protagonists (Fifine, the Man, and his wife, Gloire) are very expressive and cleverly handled. The drama opens with a clever tone-picture of the Fair, which is almost one of the best things in the work, this being followed by a "Fifine portrait" of much cleverness. The epilogue music perhaps attracts one more by its cleverness than its inspiration, but here, too, the composer has written some pages glowing with a fine emotion and of much dramatic power.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Mr. Granville Bantock's orchestral drama, "Fifine," is a very brilliant and spirited piece of work, and in many ways stronger than any other work of the same class by Bantock.

YORKSHIRE POST.

No living musician has a greater power of orchestral expression, and his poetic fancy is inexhaustible. Never has it been employed on a more charming subject or with better effect than in this case. He has produced a work which will compare with the symphonic-poems of Strauss, and will be regarded by most people as more uniformly musical. It is not going too far to style it a masterly work, and entirely successful. It gives us the composer's own impressions of the drama it illustrates in absolutely musical terms. It glows with colour; it is brilliant, atmospheric, passionate, in turn; and it is also thoroughly spontaneous and unaffected.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

In his orchestral drama, "Fifine at the Fair," Professor Granville Bantock has far surpassed all his previous achievements in orchestral music, and attempts not without success the scope of Strauss.

OBSERVER.

Professor Granville Bantock's "Fifine at the Fair," which is inspired by Browning's poem, is, taken as a whole, perhaps the strongest and best-proportioned of all the composer's symphonic works, and the fullest of real feeling, while the themes are the most expressive he has given us. . . . The way in which they are used, so as to represent the interplay of forces between the three chief characters, and the genuine power and beauty of much of the orchestral writing, make the work exceedingly good to hear.

SUNDAY TIMES.

He has succeeded in giving us a very picturesque and coherent Symphonic Poem, which is better worth listening to than almost anything from his pen.

ODE ON THE NATIVITY

THE WORDS BY

WILLIAM DUNBAR

SET TO MUSIC

FOR SOPRANO SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

C. HUBERT H. PARRY.

Price Two Shillings.

Paper Boards, 2s. 6d. Cloth, 4s.

String Parts, 7s. (In the Press); Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

THE TIMES.

It is a very happy work, full of a fresh, strong spirit of joyfulness. It opens with a simple pastoral theme which sets the tone of the whole and puts one in the presence of a strong personality brimming over with vitality. The swinging phrases of the "Rorate cœli desuper" begun by the soprano solo and taken up by the choir carry on the feeling and throughout the Ode is continuously woven out of these and similar materials. There is majesty in the call to the heavenly powers—"archangels, angels, and dominations"—to worship the Saviour, intimate tenderness in the appeal of the soprano solo, "Sinners, be glad and penance do," and the later stanzas calling upon all Nature in turn are touched with delightful suggestions of poetic feeling.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Sir Hubert Parry has given us a legitimate successor to "The Blest Pair of Sirens." . . . Dunbar's poem consists of six stanzas, each followed by the refrain "Et nobis Puer natus est," or nearly so. A lovely pastoral movement opens the cantata. . . . We have no composer, and have had none in the memory of living man, who could so well have extracted the liveliness from Dunbar's verses as Parry, none who could have maintained as well as struck the true note of healthy geniality, and maintained it so homogeneously, none who could have done this with a more marked individuality. . . . There is much that is beautiful for the soprano soloist, on this occasion Miss Ada Forrest, but nothing so lovely as the appeal to sinners to be glad unless it is the sublime gloriousness of the refrain of the fifth stanza and the superb sound of the chorus work in the final—a passage well worthy to rank with the famous close of Milton's Ode referred to at the beginning of this notice. . . . We are likely to hear far more of the Ode than of any of the immediately previous compositions by Sir Hubert Parry, and I, for one, will gladly be among the listeners whensoever called upon, for it is a work of sublime loftiness, of joyous feeling.

STANDARD.

It is difficult to decide which to admire more, the fidelity with which the composer repeatedly selects the same method to express his thoughts, or the ease with which he develops his subject and elaborates his contrapuntal themes. . . . There is some good eight-part writing, and the music for the double chorus in the final section is of characteristic strength and fibre, and ultimately develops into a powerful climax, which gives place to a serene treatment of "Pro nobis puer natus est," the refrain of the poem.

MORNING POST.

There is nothing complicated or diffuse in the music. The simple design adopted shows the hand of experience. Anything ornate would have been out of keeping with the nature of the poem. The customary resource of the composer is employed with full effect, and it remains yet another example of Sir Hubert Parry's power of writing vocal music that has a definite and individual ring. An appropriate atmosphere is established at the beginning by an introduction of pastoral character which creates a cheerful mental picture. The impression of simple joy is never disturbed throughout the work. Some broad unison effects from the chorus, a fine choral passage in Sir Hubert Parry's best style, illustrative of the celestial choirs, a melodious and well-written section for the solo voice, and a well-wrought climax before the calm end are the features in this gratifying work. . . . The fame of the work is likely to extend, carrying with it an increase of the renown of the composer.

STAR.

The composer has reproduced the archaic quaintness of the text and there is a fine joyousness about the music. It has an abundance of characteristic Parryish climaxes in which bustling figures tumble over each other in sheer exuberance of spirits, and sometimes, as in the charming pastoral opening, a higher imaginative note is touched. The skill with which the melody of the refrain is varied is notable.

TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

THE ORGAN

BY

JOHN STAINER.

EDITED BY JOHN E. WEST.

An important feature of the present Edition of this invaluable and popular Organ Primer is the adoption of the now universally recognized system of fingering—1.2.3.4.5., which is here substituted for the older system—×.1.2.3.4.—in all cases where fingering is marked.

In the explanatory portion of the book, opportunity has been taken of briefly mentioning one or two of the principal additions and improvements to the instrument which have been made since the book was first issued.

Bearing in mind that the Author's aim was to assist, in as concise a manner as possible, the early steps of an organ student, the Editor has refrained from adding any further exercises or pieces to those which were already given. But the addition of a few extra fingering and phrasing marks seemed necessary here and there, and, in the five concluding pieces, the laying-out of one or two of the manual passages has been rendered clearer to the player's eye by means of a slight re-staving.

The admirable explanations and diagrams of the Tubular-Pneumatic and Electric actions have been supplied by Mr. L. Simon, of Messrs. Norman & Beard, Ltd.

"Novello's Organ Album No. 3 is remarkably good value. For the modest sum of three and sixpence, you get twelve pieces of varying excellence. As a rule, such albums are a kind of musical dust-heap, in which the purchaser delves (not too successfully) for his moneysworth. You need have no anxiety in this case."—Musical Opinion, June, 1912.

"Must be classed as one of the finest works in modern organ literature. The first movement is practically in usual Sonata form. The development section is particularly brilliant, and the quiet cadence leading into the recapitulation is of arresting beauty."

"The slow movement, in the nature of a chaconne, is beautiful and restful. A brilliant cadenza leads to an exciting introduction to a most interesting triple fugue (confined to manuals). Afterwards the composer works backwards through the sections preceding the fugue, unwinding himself, as it were, before starting on a magnificent Coda befitting a magnificent work."—Daily Mail.

A NEW DEPARTURE IN PIANOS.

An idea prevails among certain people that a Brinsmead Piano, produced by a firm world-famous for its manufactures, is only within reach of those whose income is large. A glance at the New Brinsmead Catalogue will expose this fallacy.

Among the latest "Brinsmeads" is one which—though in all respects up to the Brinsmead standard of Durability, and, in Touch and Tone, affording a quality hitherto only attained in the most expensive instruments—IS WITHIN REACH OF THE MOST MODERATE INCOME. This model is undoubtedly the last word in the manufacture of the modern British piano.

Write to Dept. 32 for the New Brinsmead Catalogue, containing full particulars and illustrations of all the latest Brinsmead Models. It will be sent post-free, together with the name and address of the local agent.

PAYMENT BY INSTALMENTS CAN BE ARRANGED.

DR. ARNE
AND RULE, BRITANNIA
BY WILLIAM HAYMAN CUMMINGS.

PREFACE.

The glorious National Song, "Rule, Britannia," is familiar to the whole British race; nevertheless, very few men and women are acquainted with the history of its birth and parentage.

In the following pages I have endeavoured to chronicle all the facts which are discoverable by diligent research, and to present them in an attractive and entertaining manner.

The life of Dr. Arne, the composer of "Rule, Britannia," offers to the reader and to the music student an interesting and instructive story, showing that natural ability, even when combined with genius, is not sufficient to ensure a triumphant and successful career. Morality and conscientious rectitude in the affairs of life are essential, and had Arne exercised these, his exceptional gifts might have enabled him to surpass his great contemporary, Handel.

It only remains to be noted that many letters and documents are here printed for the first time, some of them copied from the original autographs in my possession. They illuminate much which has hitherto been obscure and uncertain in the career of a famous composer.

AUGUSTUS STEPHEN VOGT.

The Musical Times

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

DECEMBER 1, 1912.

AUGUSTUS STEPHEN VOGT.

In our November number Dr. Vogt, of Toronto, gave an account of some of the musical impressions he had derived during his recent sojourn on the Continent and in this country. It is evident that he is a musician of wide experience, an acute and receptive observer, and able to estimate judicially the force and value of the stream of tendency he has examined. He is best known in this country by his repute as the conductor of the Mendelssohn Choir, on whose achievements critics in Canada and the States have lavished their enviably opulent vocabulary of praise.

It was a wise and prudent step on the part of Dr. Vogt to determine to devote a year's holiday to the investigation of musical conditions here and abroad, in order that by actual experience he might be able to relate the standards that obtain here, especially as regards choral matters, with those attained in Toronto. For this purpose he has been afforded unique opportunities of investigation and of friendly personal intercourse with nearly all the leaders of the profession. We are glad to have his assurance that he is deeply sensible of the cordiality of his reception.

Dr. Vogt's father was a native of Baden and his mother a native of Berne. His musical leanings were inherited from his father, an organ-builder, who emigrated to Canada in 1842, and was among the first to establish an organ factory in Ontario. Dr. Vogt was born in 1861, at Washington, County Oxford, Ontario, but his early boyhood was spent in Elmira, Waterloo County, a centre of the most fertile and wealthy section of this province, inhabited principally by Germans. The district has had, and still has, a good reputation for its musical inclinations, which take shape in the formation of Männerchören and the practice of instrumental music.

Vogt as a boy had a fair singing voice, which brought him into touch with musical influences, and at an early age he studied pianoforte playing and to a smaller extent the organ, under the best local teachers. When he was twelve he was appointed organist of St. James Lutheran Church, Elmira, where the organ built by his father still remains. A mixed-voice choir led the music, and young Vogt was facetiously styled 'Cantor' by the music-loving pastor, the Rev. John Salinger. The musical portion of the service was plain, and largely congregational in character, consisting chiefly of chorales of the usual German type. Dr. Vogt believes that this dignified and serious music exerted much influence over his taste—an influence not displaced by later types of hymn-tunes. Young Vogt's education was bi-lingual; at school he was taught only English, but in the home he talked German. This system still obtains in the German districts, and Dr. Vogt thinks it accounts in a large measure for the remarkable progress that nationality has made in the Dominion. The Germans, he considers, are adaptable to the circumstances in which they find themselves, but some other settlers are not so plastic—they prefer to mould their surroundings to fit their conservative habits. In reply to a question as to whether the Germans have exerted special racial influence in musical matters, Dr. Vogt says that their numbers are too small relatively to effect much in this way. He thinks that Canada has been more inoculated with modern ideas of music by its young musicians who have had their musical education abroad and have returned to their native land. This is especially the case with regard to pianoforte playing.

When Vogt was sixteen years of age he had further instruction in Hamilton, Ontario, from the best-known teachers in that city. A year later he was appointed organist and choirmaster of the First Methodist Church in St. Thomas, Ontario. After acting for three years, he resigned this post in order to study at the New England Conservatory, then, and still, perhaps, the best-equipped and most influential institution of its kind in the States. The principal was Mr. Eben Tourjee. In 1883 he returned to St. Thomas, and remained there until 1885, when he took the important step of going to Leipsic to enter its celebrated Conservatoire. Here he pursued organ study under Dr. Papperitz; pianoforte under Reinecke, Rehberg, and Ruthardt; harmony and composition under Jadassohn and Quasdorf. Amongst his contemporaries were Percy Pitt, Philip Halstead (Glasgow), Georg Schumann (Berlin), W. O. Forsyth (Toronto), H. M. Field (Toronto), Nora Clench (Toronto), Robin H. Legge (London), and Ernest Hutcheson (Australia: now in Berlin). He remained in Leipsic nearly four years. During this period he derived much inspiration from attending the weekly performances of motets at St. Thomas Church by the choir of men and boys, who in that celebrated place of worship carried on the traditions of the Bach period. In these favourable circumstances he heard Bach's Passion music (St. Matthew and St. John), the B minor Mass, and many a cappella motets of both the German and Italian (Palestrina) schools—altogether a vitalising influence of supreme value to a young music student. In 1889 he returned to Canada and took up the position of organist and choirmaster of Jarvis Street Baptist Church, Toronto, one of the wealthiest congregations in the city, and renowned for its generous support of music in connection with the service. The choir was a mixed-voice one with professional leaders, but it was not of the soli-quartet type, so common in the States. Dr. Vogt says that this type of musical service has never made way in Canada and is not likely to do so. Whilst he occupied this important position he endeavoured to alter the somewhat characterless nature of the service by introducing as much as possible a cappella music by leading classical and modern composers, and at the same time to preserve the congregational element. In order to stimulate the congregation to take due part in the service of praise, Dr. Vogt held occasional week-night practices at which he lectured on the subject, and he considers that this course had considerable effect upon the choice of music in which choir and congregation combined.

THE MENDELSSOHN CHOIR.

The public recitals of the church choir on week nights led to the idea of forming a large organization open to outsiders. This scheme took definite shape in 1894, and the new choir was named after Mendelssohn, not to indicate a special devotion to that composer's music, but to give it a well-known musical connection. In the first years of the existence of the Society, it did, however, do tribute to its patronymic by including at least one of Mendelssohn's compositions in each programme. Later on, a caustic critic had occasion to remark that he presumed the title was maintained because the choir never performed any of Mendelssohn's works. The new choir started with a membership of 180 singers. All candidates were examined in sight-singing, vocal power, and as to their musical intelligence, and this examination has been in force until the present day. No teaching of musical rudiments or of sight-singing has ever been attempted, such matters being left to teachers who make a speciality of these branches of musical education. Dr. Vogt shares the experience of many other choir-trainers in finding that singers trained on tonic sol-fa lines are amongst the most valuable choralists, and he is also in agreement with other conductors in estimating sight-singing capacity as only one of the factors that go to make the most useful singer. It is only too often the case that the good sight-singer is always sight-singing, and does not learn the music; whereas a less competent sight-singer, gifted with a retentive musical memory, will very quickly sing fluently, and be free to respond to the requirements of interpretation.

In 1897 the choir was disbanded amicably, mainly on a question of government, but it was not long before it was reconstituted on a new basis, which recognised the advantages of a benevolent despotism. The reformed constitution of the choir has some peculiar and interesting features. It is a corporate body of sixteen members, who are required to organize the choir every year for the performance of standard choral works. Every member has to re-apply for membership before the commencement of the season, and to satisfy the conductor that he or she is qualified to remain on the books; and the sixteen members of the incorporation must also similarly qualify each year. The choice of music is absolutely the conductor's responsibility.

The répertoire of the choir covers practically all forms of choral music, including glees and madrigals of the old English and Belgian schools, unaccompanied motets by old Italian and German composers, a cappella choruses chosen from the works of such composers as Bach, Cornelius, Brahms, César Cui, Hubert Parry, Edward Elgar, Granville Bantock, Percy Pitt, Tchaikovsky, Mackenzie, Mendelssohn, Gounod, Howard Brockway, Coleridge-Taylor, Dr. Walford Davies, J. Frederick Bridge, George Martin, and many others. In the larger forms the choir has in recent years introduced such works to Toronto as Beethoven's ninth Symphony, Brahms's 'German' Requiem, Verdi's 'Manzoni' Requiem, Wolf-Ferrari's 'La Vita Nuova,' Berlioz's 'Te Deum,' Gabriel Pièrne's 'The Children's Crusade,' Elgar's 'Caractacus,' Hugo Wolf's 'The Mad Fire-Rider,' and other similar larger and smaller compositions indicative of the resourcefulness of the choir, and its desire to avoid the conventional paths of the more conservative choral organizations.

In the New York, Chicago, Buffalo, Cleveland, and Boston concerts of the Society, its greatest successes have been won in such works as the motets of Palestrina and Lotti, alla cappella compositions of Elgar, Bantock, Brahms, Pitt, and Cornelius, such short concerted numbers as Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' the most important choral excerpts from Bach's B minor Mass, Elgar's 'Caractacus' and 'King Olaf,' and Wagner's 'Meistersinger,' and performances in their entirety of Brahms's 'Requiem,' Liszt's 13th Psalm, Verdi's 'Requiem,' and Beethoven's ninth Symphony.

This year's annual souvenir booklet of thirty-five pages reproduces many Press criticisms. We quote a few sentences from the New York journals, which would have no patriotic bias to inspire their tributes. The singing of the choir in the exacting choral movement of Beethoven's ninth Symphony elicited unqualified praise from the foremost critics. 'For once,' wrote Mr. Aldrich (New York Times), 'the chorus counted for more in this work than the orchestra.' Mr. Henry Finck (New York Post), declared that the choir is as perfect in its way as the Boston Symphony Orchestra (the foremost orchestra of America) is in its class. Mr. H. E. Krehbiel (New York Tribune) said that 'The choir seems to be as perfect technically as can well be imagined.' The German organ, the New Yorker Staats Zeitung said:

> One has to search the whole world to find such wonderfully fine material as this choir possesses. The attacks are instantaneous, the sustaining of the tone noble, and the release thrillingly spontaneous, without being violently chopped off. Then there is a splendid intelligence and unanimity as to the phrasing and shading, and the climaxes are built up with a daring boldness that one is amazed at times to hear.

Similar glowing remarks are made by the Boston (U.S.) and Buffalo (U.S.) critics. The Boston Journal says:

> The Mendelssohn Choir captured musical Boston last night. They came to town with New York's unconditional surrender in their pocket; they achieved another overwhelming triumph.

The decision of Dr. Vogt to visit Europe and to be absent for twelve months was a crisis in the history of the choir. The members would not hear of another conductor being appointed, and agreed to suspend operations during the absence of Dr. Vogt, and they voted him his full salary, which is no less than 5,000 dollars (£1,000) per annum. A significant personal tribute!

The choir consists of 75 sopranos, 52 altos, 53 tenors, and 60 basses; total 240. Each member subscribes two dollars a year, and is allowed five dollars' worth of tickets for the concerts. All music copies are loaned free to members. In the training in choral technique no special exercises are, as a rule, employed, the music practised being considered sufficient for the purpose; and as many of the best professional solo vocalists in Toronto are members of the choir, vocal exercises would be superfluous.

The season's work of the choir is arranged on festival lines. Meetings begin in October. Three rehearsals are held every week: one for ladies, one for gentlemen, and one collective. No concerts are given until February, when a series of five is given in one week. After this event the choir is open to visit other towns.

The festival takes place in the Massey Music Hall, which will accommodate an audience of 3,200 persons. The 1911-12 series of concerts cost about 27,000 dollars (£5,400), and practically all the seats were sold beforehand. For the last six seasons the Chicago Theodore Thomas Symphony Orchestra of ninety-two performers (conductor, Mr. Fred. Stock) has co-operated with the choir.

The testimony to the outstanding merit of the Mendelssohn Choir we have to accept on trust—a trust mingled with the hope that the choir will soon favour us with a convincing demonstration of its powers. We share the legitimate pride of its promoters that a British organization has accomplished so much for musical art. We are glad to hear that a project for the choir to come to England in the Spring of 1915 is under consideration. If this visit is decided upon, it is certain that the choir and its conductor, as an artistic musical unit, and the members individually, will be very cordially welcomed.

In a recent communication to Musical Canada, regarding church choirs, Dr. Vogt writes as follows:

A study of musical conditions in Europe which does not take into account the fine achievements of some of the leading English and Continental church choirs does not fully serve its purpose. Owing to a somewhat prevalent belief that choral music is limited in its range of expression, it does not always win the recognition to which the achievements of its best exponents entitle it. It is but too true that, generally speaking, choral music is in the hands of a hopelessly dull and pedantic type of musician. The narrow musical sympathies of the conventional choirmaster, whose chief musical inspirations have been acquired in the organ loft, are but too often reflected in the dry, laboured, and absolutely inartistic efforts of the unfortunate choristers whose fate it is to be associated with him. Choral societies trained under such conditions usually find an unresponsive public, and sooner or later come to grief. Church choirs, because of the musical limitations of most services, may exist longer under unfavourable leadership than would be the case with concert organizations. But distinctive artistic results in both classes of choral bodies are almost certain to be recognized and appreciated everywhere, and some of my most pleasant recollections of the past few months are those associated with the fine singing of certain choirs of prominent Continental and English churches and Cathedrals.

One of the finest choirs to be heard in Austria is that of St. Stephen's Cathedral, Vienna. It was interesting to note that whilst many of our Roman Catholic churches in Canada are making a brave struggle to live up to the Pope's recent edict regarding elimination of women's voices from the music of the church, St. Stephen's, Vienna, with all its wealth of resources, ignores the restrictions of the edict in this particular. The choir of this church presents a most interesting and elaborate musical service in which, besides the accompaniment of a large organ, a very efficient orchestra is employed. In Dresden one may hear the well-trained choir of the Kreuzkirche, which Dresdeners regard as standing well to the front amongst the leading Continental church choirs. Neither of these, however, quite equal the famous Thomaserchor of Leipsic or the Domchor of Berlin, either in purity of voice-production or subtlety of style.

Two of the most highly efficient church choirs of London are unquestionably those of Brompton Oratory and Westminster Cathedral (Roman Catholic). At the former church a beautiful and dignified musical service has been developed in which the highest vocal standards are allied to an impressiveness of style and a true spirit of devotion. The boys are splendidly trained, and the general balance of the choir is admirable. In choice of répertoire somewhat greater latitude is permitted, apparently, than at Westminster Cathedral. Several things are included in the regular musical offerings of this choir to which the attention of choirmaster Barclay and organist D'Evry was drawn by Toronto choral enthusiasts, including some of the best unaccompanied choruses of Lotti, Grieg and others. On Sunday, September 29, the music of the day was Mozart's Mass in C.

At Westminster Cathedral, the choir of which, under Dr. Terry, is rightly deemed one of the very finest in England, one is impressed with the splendid manner in which the Gregorian music is sung. In a cappella singing this choir also demonstrated its quality in beautifully graded and devotional renderings of motets by Palestrina and Arcadelt. There appear to be two choirs in this cathedral, one occupying an elevated position in the rear of the reredos, the other being placed in the usual choir stalls of the chancel, similar to the placing of the boys and men in Anglican Cathedrals. The unaccompanied motets named, which were sung by the choir in the far distance, produced an unusually striking, ethereal effect.

In days gone by the famous choirs of Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's Cathedral were those most discussed by Canadian tourists upon their return home. Although I have many times visited Westminster Abbey and enjoyed the music, the boys never appeared to me to have sung with finer effect than at Evensong on the occasion of my last visit to the church several days ago. The anthem, Handel's 'Let the bright Seraphim,' was rendered with delightful confidence, much beauty and smoothness of tone, and convincing style. Not the least enjoyable feature of the service were the very finely graded and admirably played accompaniments.

Proceeding to St. Paul's one was conscious of the exquisite purity of tone exhibited by the boys, and of the influence of master hands in the control of the musical services of the Cathedral. Unfortunately, the excessive echo at St. Paul's prevents many from realising the superior achievements of the choir and their outstanding excellence, vocally and artistically.

At St. Margaret's the excellent work of the choir in a fine anthem by Coleridge-Taylor, and the really inspiring singing of the choirs of the Temple Church and Southwark Cathedral will remain pleasant memories of our sojourn in London. Mention must also be made of the high standards obtaining at Birmingham where, during the Festival week, special Evensong services were held daily in which the singing of the choir was much admired by the many critical visitors whom the triennial Festival itself attracted to the city.

MUSIC IN TORONTO.

Dr. Vogt says that the musical disposition and, to some extent, the unusual prosperity of the people of Ontario are reflected in the number and progressiveness of the many schools of music which have sprung up in various parts of the province. In Toronto alone there are four well-equipped music schools, the oldest and largest of which—the Toronto Conservatory of Music, Dr. Edward Fisher, musical director—last year had an enrolment of over 2,000 pupils. The Toronto College of Music, of which the well-known Englishman, Dr. F. H. Torrington, is musical director, also enjoys a large enrolment. More recent additions to the musical institutions of the city are the Hambourg Conservatory, of which Prof. Michael Hambourg is musical director, and the Columbian Conservatory, of which Mr. Peter Kennedy is musical director. A number of chamber-music organizations add variety and character to the city's musical life, and, but for the exception of permanent grand opera, Toronto might almost consider its musical equipment well up to its present artistic requirements. For grand opera, however, it is compelled to look to the admirably organized Montreal Grand Opera Company, and the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York also includes Toronto in its tours. The Montreal Company is perhaps the most important undertaking of its kind to be found in any city in the Empire outside Covent Garden. Canadians are indebted to the public spirit of Colonel Frank Meighen, of Montreal, for the maintenance and development of this highly efficient institution. The weakest feature of musical life in Canada at the present time lies in orchestral work. Outside the excellent Toronto Symphony Orchestra and the orchestra of the Montreal Opera Company, which gives a regular series of orchestral concerts in that Canadian metropolis, there has been a rather slow development in this direction. A large and admirable amateur orchestra exists in Ottawa, under the direction of Mr. Donald Heins. Quebec city also has maintained an efficient amateur orchestral body. Hamilton and London, Ontario, have also, but somewhat spasmodically, done admirable work with amateur or semi-professional bodies of players. In Winnipeg and the Far West there is a gradual awakening in this direction: all of which proves that in the midst of a most remarkable material development the people of Canada are not losing sight of the higher and ennobling things of life.

Amongst the most useful musical organizations in Toronto, the permanent orchestra conducted by Mr. Mark Welsman is distinguished. Orchestral concerts are given every fortnight from October to April, the admission being from fifty cents to two dollars. Last year, notwithstanding very liberal support by the public, the loss was 23,000 dollars (about £4,600). It is an evidence of the musical enthusiasm of the city that this large deficit was promptly paid by the guarantors.

Toronto rejoices in having other efficient choral Societies besides that conducted by Dr. Vogt. There are the Toronto Oratorio Society (Dr. J. Edward Broome), the Madrigal Society for unaccompanied music (Mr. Francis Coombs), the Cecilia Society (Dr. James Dickinson), the Schubert Choir (Mr. H. M. Fletcher), and the National Chorus, established in 1904 (Dr. Albert Ham).

SCHOOL MUSIC.

Dr. Vogt states that the Board of Education of the City of Toronto has for a considerable time pursued a progressive policy with regard to music in the schools. For many years this important work was under the personal supervision of Mr. A. T. Cringan, who gradually developed a most effective system, combining the best features of tonic sol-fa and staff notations. Several years ago, on account of demands on his time in connection with his private classes in voice-culture, Mr. Cringan resigned, being succeeded by Mr. Llewelyn Rees. Mr. Cringan has since continued in the Provincial Normal School as instructor of teachers in this work, and the good results of his methods are noticeable throughout Ontario.

A series of choral competitions for challenge shields and other trophies is maintained annually between the various schools of the city. These competitions have awakened great interest and have resulted in the keenest rivalry. As a consequence there has been noticeable a consistent development in essential matters of voice-production, style, and general interpretative details. In some of the schools a surprisingly high standard has been reached. For some years the adjudications have been entrusted to Dr. Vogt, and since hearing what is being done in Europe in this respect, he feels the Toronto authorities have no reason to be dissatisfied with the quality of what is being achieved at home.

Amongst his diversions Dr. Vogt has a passion for books, more especially of the historical and biographical variety. He is an enthusiastic but, he says, a poor golfer (a facetious journal recently stated that he plays a Jew's-harp when he misses the ball!).

After he left Canada on his present tour the National Club of Toronto elected him as an honorary member—a rare distinction. The degree of Doctor of Music was conferred upon him in 1907 by the University of Toronto in recognition of his services to music in Canada.

OPERA: A PLEA FOR THE TREATMENT OF MODERN SUBJECTS.

By Gerald Cumberland.

If it were just to credit operatic composers with the psychology of their heroes and heroines, we should be faced by the spectacle of a crowd of musicians boiling over with passion, and surrendering themselves either to immediate death or to a long life of hollow-cheeked misery. But the lives of eminent composers are not what they might appear to be from their works; for the most part, they are passed in commendable industry in the dingy but quite respectable suburbs of various European towns. The creatures of their imagination are frenetic, bigamous, unscrupulous, and neurotic; they themselves are quite unassailably virtuous. Moreover, most of those who crowd to the opera-houses of Berlin, Vienna, Paris, and London to see the latest thing in twentieth century passion, are ordinary ratepaying citizens of unimpeachable integrity; they applaud conduct on the stage which, in private life, would cause them inconceivable horror.

Marvellous, indeed, are the things we suffer on the operatic stage, for we become entirely different persons the moment we enter a theatre. We discard our sense of humour and assume a quite absurd interest in the intricate love-affairs of a group of Italian villagers, or of the Queen of Sheba, or of some mad woman of ancient Greece. We look with complacency on the sentimental cad in Puccini's 'Madama Butterfly,' and approve most heartily of the senseless behaviour of that band of brainless tenors who walk through the pages of Rossini, Verdi, Meyerbeer, Donizetti, and of all the long list of Italian and Jewish composers whose music has become so quickly unnecessary. One of the very few operas in which unadulterated passion justifies itself is 'Carmen'; there we have tragedy instead of futility, and a feeling of sincerity in the place of sentimental make-believe. But out of every thousand operas that have ever been staged, nine hundred and ninety have dealt with the passion of love either in a mawkish and utterly ridiculous manner, or in a style of outspoken and rather revolting crudity. And generation after generation of mankind has not only put up with this, but has consistently and by no means in vain asked for more. Operatic music has always inclined towards flabbiness, and at definite periods it has degenerated into nothing more dignified than the indiscretion of the servant-girl. The atmosphere of the opera-house is very largely the atmosphere of the halfpenny novelette.

Now, why is this? What is there in human nature which compels men to accept gladly at one moment what they would scornfully reject at another? The explanation of the matter, I believe, lies in this: that most music-lovers regard opera either with genial tolerance or with half-conscious contempt. It is certain that they do not look upon it as a serious form of art. It is a prolonged liqueur and cigar—a digestive—a fashionable way pour passer le temps. These, you say, are platitudes. They are; that is why I have felt impelled to write this article.

Now, the worst feature of this absurd business is that the public attitude to opera is not altogether unreasonable. Opera is not taken seriously simply because it is not serious. It trifles with the public. It is a pretence—a quite charming and attractive pretence, if you like, but still, for all that, a pretence. I myself have frequently been in doubt whether to go to the music-hall or to the opera, because the attractions offered by both were so similar in kind; and on one or two occasions I have chosen the latter as being a less severe mental exercise than the former. Sooner or later every kind of art obtains the recognition it deserves, and opera has well-earned the friendly condescension which we give it. The modern Italian work is preferred to the nobility of Gluck, and a year hence we shall no doubt find that a certain French opera is a successful rival to Wagner's 'Parsifal.' We are all inoculated with the virus of sentimentality, and our musical sinews have been relaxed by the hothouse atmosphere of uncontrollable passion.

It is frequently said that music is only emotional; it would be more true to say that music is anything you wish to make it. The operatic composer excuses himself for his choice of subject by declaring that the public is not interested in drama, save in that form of drama which is induced by the conflicting emotions brought into play by love, jealousy, and the like; he adds that music lends itself most naturally to the exploitation of sensuous feeling. Neither excuse has the warrant of actual fact. 'Hamlet,' the greatest drama in the world, has no sensuous emotion; 'Macbeth' has none; the historical plays by the same writer have little. Even our contemporary stage has recognised that fine and stimulating drama may be made out of other material than the eternal trio involved in love, hate, and jealousy. Mr. Galsworthy, Mr. Bernard Shaw, Mr. J. M. Synge, and a host of smaller playwrights, have given us work that touches life at many points instead of only at one, and what has been done on the stage of the theatre may also be done on the stage of the opera-house.

I venture to put forward a plea for the selection of modern heroic subjects for operatic treatment. It is mere affectation for writers and composers to hunt persistently in historical records for material for a plot; life to-day is as abounding in colour and as full of fine action as ever it was. Men without imagination can see no chivalry in contemporary life; it is so near them that they are blind to its beauty. There never was a generation of men that did not decry the ugliness and cynicism of its own time, declaring that the age of heroism was dead, that commercialism was rampant, and that romance had departed from the world. These things are never true. While man remains man and does not degenerate into a beast, there will always be heroism and romance. If a man is never a hero to his valet, that is the fault of the valet. No age is noble to those who live in it; but that is owing to the blindness of the people themselves. Is there no romance in aviation? None in the colonisation of Canada? None in stricken Ireland? None in the ambition of the politician? None even in the Insurance Act? There is romance in a thousand things to the man with the seeing eye. It is only the prig or the fool who worships the days of his grandfather. The true man lives at this moment and in whatever place he finds himself; his imagination is fed not only by the contemplation of the scroll of history, but by every event of his own time. He is stimulated into action not so much by the example of those who are dead, as by the deeds of those who are living, and most of all by the quick, generous emotions he feels within his own breast.

Though it be true that each of us is rooted in the past, it is truer still that each of us breathes the air and eats the food of to-day. The Past may not be dead, but it is not so warm and fertile and inspiring as the Present.

Do you gather from all this that I advocate the writing of an opera about aviation or the Insurance Act? I do nothing of the kind. But if there be romance in these things, as I contend, is there not still more romance in other modern subjects more suitable for operatic treatment? The ardent spirit of man expresses itself in countless aspirations made visible and audible; many of these manifestations of his spiritual activity are ignored by composers, for to them the thing that is near is never romantic. There is no glamour in what is familiar. Opera has but a slender hold upon the affections of English people, because it is largely a pretence. No opera I know of is founded on a modern subject of deep and general interest. If there were such an opera it would command the respect we deny to the opera of passion. But in this country, at least, opera will remain an exotic growth until we have a composer who is absorbed in and obsessed by the problems of his own time.

REAL PROGRAMME MUSIC.

By Claude Aveling.

The following is the title-page of a work in the writer's possession:

PEACE
A Grand Characterestic (sic)
SONATA
Composed and humbly dedicated to the Right Honble.
LORD HAWKESBURY
BY LOUIS JANSEN

London: Printed by J. & H. Caulfield, No. 36 Piccadilly and T. Jones & Co., No. (*) Bishopsgate Street Within.

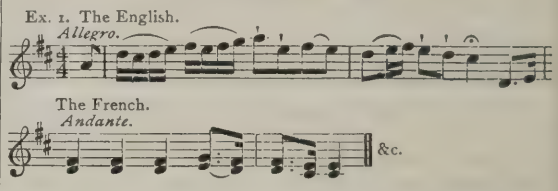
It was written to celebrate the peace negotiations of 1801, which formed the basis of the Treaty of Amiens in the following year. For the present purpose it is enough to mention that France and England, having been at death-grips for some time, were now so exhausted that a 'breather' was welcome. Lord Hawkesbury, our Foreign Secretary, and M. Otto, the French Envoy, patched up a compromise and signed the preliminaries of peace amid remarkable scenes of 'mafficking' and rejoicing in London on the part of the Peace party (the 'Honest' men of this work), shouting down the whines of the War party (the 'Monopolists'), who foretold failure for any treaty which left France with a single ship with which to challenge Britain's maritime supremacy.

'Peace' is too fine a specimen of the idiotic descriptive pianoforte piece to be buried in oblivion. Its eight pages contain practically all the absurdities which go to make programme-music an object of derision when its vaulting ambition o'erleaps itself: the classic 'Battle of Prague' must look to its laurels, for, amongst other impossibilities of suggestion, 'Peace' attempts to make notes mean words, the hearer being expected to guess at the words in the composer's mind from notes hammered out on the keyboard.

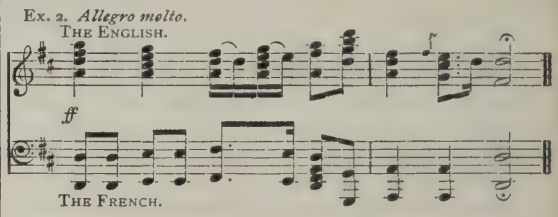
The work may now be allowed to speak for itself: the pianoforte is very talkative, as may be gathered from the fact that the wording attached to the music examples is all as in the original text.

We open with 'The Negotiation,' the usual alternation of tunes—'Rule, Britannia,' and the 'Marseillaise':

'THE NEGOTIATION.'



leading eventually to a very feeble attempt at making both parties talk at once:

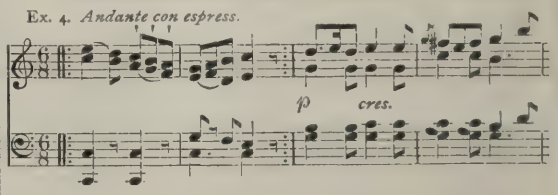


There is a good deal of 'back-chat,' and as much running backwards and forwards as in a modern strike conference:

'THE MESSENGER'S JOURNEY TO CALAIS.'

A placid barcarolle suggests that the treacherous English Channel was caught napping:

'THE MESSENGER CROSSING THE SEA TO DOVER.'



The same land-tune which brought the messenger from Paris to Calais takes him from Dover to London for the conference, at which we hear the persuasive tones of the French Envoy, suave and polite, as he shrugs his shoulders, answered by honest John Bull with mixed affability and asperity:

* Sic.

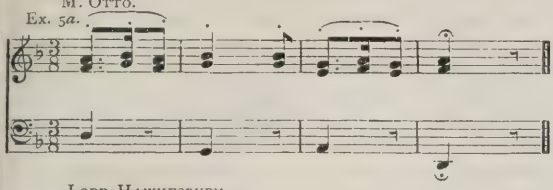
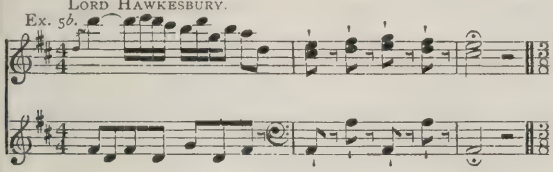
'CONFERENCE BETWEEN LORD HAWKESBURY AND M. OTTO.'

Ex. 5a.



Ex. 5b.



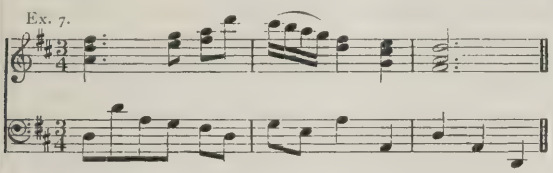
Finally, M. Otto and Lord Hawkesbury sign their names, the pianoforte kindly assisting :

'SIGNING THE PRELIMINARIES.'

Ex. 6.

'God save the King' is played (at an inconvenient point, or the reverse, according to the attitude of the audience), with the unfamiliar ending :

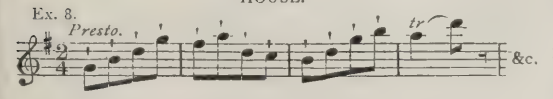
Ex. 7.



The Lord Mayor is then sought, with much knocking at doors :

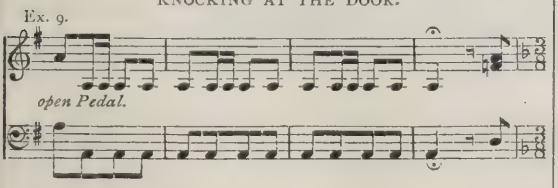
'EXPRESS TO THE LORD MAYOR AT THE MANSION HOUSE.'

Ex. 8.



'KNOCKING AT THE DOOR.'

Ex. 9.

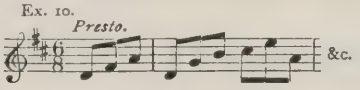


'THE MESSENGER'S DISAPPOINTMENT IN NOT FINDING HIS LORDSHIP IN TOWN.'

But his Lordship has gone to his country seat at Clapham, so hither the messenger gallops in the regulation $\frac{6}{8}$ time :

'HE PROCEEDS TO CLAPHAM.'

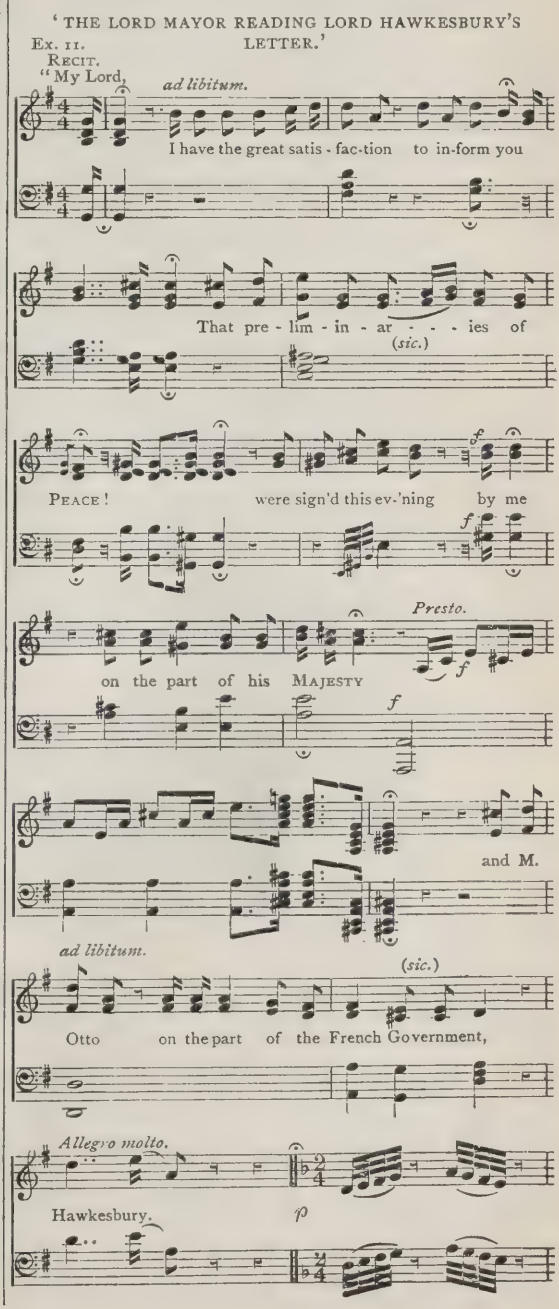
Ex. 10.



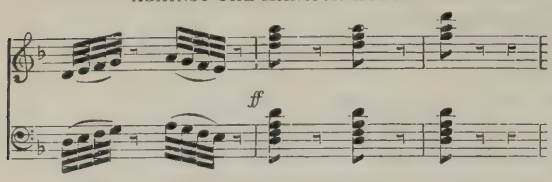
After more knocking, his Lordship is found and reads Lord Hawkesbury's letter, or rather the pianoforte does so for him, the audience having to guess the words for themselves (note the proud forte on 'by me') :

'THE LORD MAYOR READING LORD HAWKESBURY'S LETTER.'

Ex. 11.



'POSTING COPIES OF LORD HAWKESBURY'S LETTER AGAINST THE MANSION HOUSE.'



Great rejoicing now ensues among the Peace party (the 'Honest'):

'THE EFFECT ON THE MINDS OF THE HONEST.'

Ex. 12. Allegro assai.

The War party ('Monopolists') protest, blubbering, but are soon silenced by an answer that admits of no retort, and the Sonata ends with the 'Ratification and Rejoicing,' illustrated by roaring cannon (fat D major chords in the bass) and clanging bells (running scales in the treble):

'THE CRIES OF THE MONOPOLISTS.'

Ex. 13. Andantino.

O dear! O dear! what very bad news! We're ruin'd, we're ruin'd, we're ruin'd, we're ru - in'd, O Andante.
Allegro.
(The answer.)
tell what is to be-come of us?
&c.

Go to the Devil and shake yourselves.

A FORERUNNER OF WAGNER.

By Ernest Newman.

It has long been a commonplace among musical historians that most of Wagner's reforms in connection with opera had been urged previously by some writer or other. An art-form capable of so much in theory, and yet so absurd in practice, must have set every man of intelligence in Europe thinking how it could be improved. Beaumarchais, Schiller, Goethe, Hoffmann, Herder, and others all contributed something to the discussion. Gluck's manifestos are of course classic. The most complete statement, however, of the case for the reformers before Wagner has only recently come to light again. It is to be found in a book entitled 'Versuch einer Aesthetik des dramatischen Tonsatzes,' by one Ignaz Franz Mosel. It was originally published in 1813—curiously enough, in the year of Wagner's birth—and has recently been made accessible to the modern reader in a reprint edited by Dr. Eugen Schmitz. Mosel was born at Vienna in 1772, and died there in 1844. He was exceptionally well qualified to write on the subject of opera. He had had a thorough musical education, and had some gifts as a composer; and it was only family pride that prohibited him from taking up musical composition as a profession. For a time he was a vice-director of the Vienna Hoftheater; and he was one of the founders of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, whose concerts he occasionally conducted. Some operatic works of his own were performed at the Vienna Theatre.

Mosel's idol was Gluck, and his book is largely an exposition of the principles on which Gluck's reforms were founded, together with suggestions prompted by a generation or so of further experience. It is remarkable how frequently he anticipates Wagner. He states more clearly, probably, than any previous writer that conception of the unified art-work upon which Wagner so strongly insisted. For Mosel the ideal opera is a combination, on practically equal terms, of poetry, music, acting, singing, and the art of the stage. The plastic arts, however, play less part in his theory than they do in Wagner's. He regards the drama as the basis of opera. Like Wagner, he sees clearly that the rules of procedure of pure music were not applicable in their entirety to the dramatic stage. As he expresses it, 'the prescriptions of pure music are as necessary to the dramatic composer as the rules of grammar are to the poet,—but no more.' The drama being the first thing to be considered, Mosel begins with an examination of the best kind of poetry for operatic setting. He first of all disposes of the theory that the Italian language is the best for opera. Italian may be more liquid and flexible than German, but these very qualities in it are apt to lead it into exaggeration and superfluity of musical ornament, whereas German is essentially a more expressive instrument for dramatic purposes. In his remarks upon the best kind of subject for opera, Mosel anticipates some familiar theories of Wagner. Complicated subjects, founded upon intrigue or political action, are unsuitable. Music is a purely emotional art, and must address itself more to the heart than to the head. The best subject, therefore, is that which gives full play to this emotional power of music. Mythological subjects are most suitable; and, says Mosel, again anticipating Wagner, if a poet can give his subject a national interest he will make of an opera something as moving as the ancient Greek tragedy. He has the wit, however, to see that these prescriptions do not apply so absolutely to the Singspiel, in which spoken dialogue is admitted, as to heroic or tragic opera. The lower plane upon which the Singspiel functions permits of a less ideal combination of material. While the choice of subjects for heroic or tragic opera is limited by the nature of music, the romantic and comic Singspiel can take any subject that the romantic play and comedy can make use of. In the handling of the subject the poet must not be egoistic; he must have regard for the nature and the needs of music. It will be all the better if he has some musical knowledge himself; if he has not, he should consult the composer both before and during the composition of the poem. 'The opera poet's first care, therefore,' he says, 'will be to write in such a way that his text is thoroughly musical, that is, not only containing nothing that is outside the possibility of musical expression, but also nothing to which music cannot give a heightened beauty and a strengthened effect.' The poet, of course, in writing his libretto, must not have the slightest regard to the exorbitant demands of the singer. As for the structure of the verse, the poet must adopt a metrical form that is suitable to musical rhythm. He should make it easy for the composer's melody to spring naturally out of the verse. The more regular lyrical pieces should have a more uniform verse structure than the essentially dramatic portions. Now and then we are made to realise that music has moved a good deal since Mosel's day. His remarks upon aria and recitative, for example, are mainly interesting only as showing how a thoughtful man of that day approached a problem that has been made less real to us now by Wagner's reform. Mosel lays it down that as music cannot follow rapidly all the changes of expression of which poetry is capable, the lyrics should therefore be of much the same character all through; the sentiment should change, at most, with each number only, not every second or third line; if the composer should aim at trying to reproduce all the changing expressions that the poet can put into a stanza, the result would only be musical chaos. There must be no spoken dialogue in tragic opera: the action must be carried on by means of recitative. Mosel gives full instructions as to the best sort of verse for recitative. Transitions from recitative to aria or ensemble must only be made when the interest of the action or the passion of the character demands an intensification of expression; arias must not be inserted in stereotyped places, such as the end of a scene or act, or in any place in which they do not seem to be naturally evolved out of the action. The aria should generally consist of one simple idea or one clearly expressed emotion. It should lead naturally out of the dialogue and into it again. In ensemble pieces, the composer must not try to express a number of contrary emotions at once; here again we have Mosel anticipating Wagner. The chorus must only be introduced when it is quite natural that a number of persons should be simultaneously expressing the same idea.

In his section on dramatic music Mosel remarks that 'it is a general delusion that any good instrumental composer can also write the music for an opera.' The opera composer, he says, requires other qualifications besides a knowledge of harmony and counterpoint. We have here probably an echo of the conflict that raged then, as it does now, between the partisans of the purely dramatic and the purely instrumental styles. Just as Wagner was accused of being no musician by the advocates of classical music, because he did not develop his music along the lines of pure form, so Gluck and his followers were assailed by the old contrapuntists as semi-amateurs. Every one knows Handel's remark about Gluck knowing no more counterpoint than Handel's cook. Mosel insists very strongly that the stage demands a style of music of its own. The aim of dramatic music, he says, being to intensify the poet's emotion, it must be simply a heightened declamation, or rather, a more animated expression of the emotions of the poet. This definition, he is careful to add, necessarily presupposes a good poem. Dramatic music must be simple and clear, and free of superfluous ornament. The first necessity of opera is the complete intelligibility of the words. As a rule one syllable should be set to one note only. The methods of instrumental music—fugues, imitations, inversions, &c.—are not suitable for opera. He anticipates Wagner all but verbally in his remark that 'music is not the end of opera, but merely the means to the end.' The composer must express the poet's idea as a whole, not in detail. This bars out the exaggerated word-painting that was still current in the opera of his day. Painting, he says, must never be substituted for expression. The expression itself is never to be overdone; it is always to be adapted in intensity to the needs of the situation. The prosody of the text must be followed by the composer in his melody; that is to say, rises, falls, accents, declamation, &c., must not be capricious. When the composer has a succession of ideas to express, he must forget that he is a musician, and remember that he is only a translator from poetic speech into musical speech; but when he has to depict emotions and passions, the composer resumes his own rights. The music must never interrupt the action, but support and animate it. If the music is good, it will carry away the singer, and make an actor of him unknown to himself. Nothing must be put in the arias merely for the sake of the singers, and the orchestration must be subordinated and adapted to the words and the voices. A true opera, he says, is not a concert of a few fine arias, but a unity made up of poetry and music, the effect being more powerful than that of any other art of the theatre. He insists very strongly upon the necessity of preserving the prosody of the verse unimpaired. Specially important words must be brought out by means of the oratorical accent. The melody must rise or fall precisely at the point where a declaimer of the verses, who is not musical, would make them do so. Pauses must only be inserted in the melody where they would naturally occur in the process of speaking the words; and no musical pause must be inserted where the poetic sense runs on. He sees that frequently dramatic music demands a different method of structure from pure music; as he puts it, the so-called musical period of two-, four-, or eight-bar melodies can often be departed from with advantage. The style of the music as a whole must vary with the quality of the poetic subject; and not only must the general nature of the theme thus be reproduced in music, but also the physical, moral, or conventional character of each person; and this adaptability of style to subject must be preserved not only in the writing, but in the orchestral accompaniment. The overture, having for its function the preparation of the hearer for what is to come, must bear the same character as that which is dominant in the opera itself.

The recitative is necessarily the foundation of the whole interest of the opera. It must be founded on good natural declamation; he praises Gluck for having diminished the old-time distinction between recitative and aria. It is always best when recitative and song melt naturally into each other at each end. The aria must not have any fixed form, but must vary in accordance with the text and the nature of the action; form and expression must always follow the feeling. The words must be clear, and the instruments used in conformity with the sentiment of the moment, not all employed all the while indiscriminately. Mosel everywhere inculcates that naturalness upon which Wagner insisted. The second singer in a duet, for example, is not to answer with the same musical phrase as the first singer, unless he is saying the same thing; and each character in an ensemble must preserve his individual expression. The harmonies of the chorus should be as simple as possible, so as not to obscure the words. For the chorus, as for the aria, there are to be no set forms; the form is to be determined by the situation. Mosel ends with some instructions to the singers as to the clear articulation of their words, and the respect they owe, as representative artists, both to the poet and the musician.

Interesting and thorough as Mosel's examination of the problem of opera is, however, the upshot of it all is to make us realise afresh the enormous originality and imaginative power of Wagner. In some ways the situation when Wagner arose was similar to that in the time of Gluck. Theorists had pointed out the true path to the salvation of opera, but the road could not be cut until the man of genius came. Without Wagner we might still have been theorising in the style of Mosel upon the best way of combining aria, recitative, duet and chorus into an artistic whole. To read Mosel's book now is to have it borne in upon us how greatly the problem of opera has altered since his time. Within less than a generation of the publication of his book, the youthful Wagner was thinking out the whole problem afresh. He saw, as probably no one else in Europe saw at that time, the enormous expansion in the possibilities of musical expression effected by the instrumental music of Beethoven; and it was only by utilising this new stream of music for the fertilisation of poetry and of the older operatic form that the new music-drama became practicable. Mosel seems quite unconscious that a new spirit had come into music under his very eyes.

It is interesting to speculate as to what would have happened to opera had Wagner not been born. The development of opera does not seem, like that of instrumental music, to follow some hidden and inevitable law. It has always depended upon the personality of some original thinker—Monteverde, Gluck, Wagner, Debussy, Strauss—and had Wagner not come, with his extraordinary blend of capacities, his poetic sense, his power of sustained musical invention, his sense of the stage, his ability to impose his ideas upon his fellow men, should we have been very much further in opera now than we were in the days when Mosel wrote?

Occasional Notes.

At the time we are writing M. Jaques-Dalcroze is giving in this country a series of demonstrations of his Rhythmic Gymnastics. He has brought with him six young girls who have learnt the system from him, and who show remarkable skill and grace in adapting their movements to the rhythm of the music played to them. It will be fair to M. Dalcroze to await the completion of his exposition before describing and passing judgment on the system. But it may be well to state here that we are convinced of the value of M. Dalcroze's methods in developing the potentialities of the rhythmic sense. The weakest part in nearly all music teaching is that to do with rhythm.

It would seem that 'Ariadne auf Naxos, Oper in einem Aufzuge von Hugo von Hofmannsthal; musik von Richard Strauss: zu spielen nach den Bürger als Edelmann des Molière' has been exceptionally successful, if only because it has provoked less disapproval than any of Strauss's other stage works. Readers of the Musical Times are by now acquainted with the peculiar design of the piece—a fantastic medley of comedy, serious opera, and ballet—and with its novel scoring—a kind of glorified chamber music for thirty-seven instruments. What has most impressed its hearers seems to be a facile, fresh, melodic quality having its roots in the old-fashioned type, and a new manner of florid vocal writing, as purely decorative as the old Italian fioriture but in free modern tonality. We are unable to give a first-hand impression of the music, but three articles contributed to The Times by a writer present at the first production are so ably and luminously written that we make no apology for quoting extensively from them below. The production took place under Strauss's own direction at the Hoftheater, Stuttgart, on October 25, as a preliminary to a Strauss Festival, at which 'Feuersnot,' 'Salome,' 'Elektra,' and 'Der Rosenkavalier' were also given. The chief players in 'Ariadne' were Madame Mizzi Teritza (Ariadne), Herr Herrman Tadlowska (Bacchus), Madame Margarethe Siems (Zerbinetta), and Herr Albin (Harlequin). The mounting (by Max Reinhardt) and incidental details were done on a lavish scale, even to the extent of providing Stradivarius, Guarnerius, and Amati stringed instruments in the orchestra and the engaging of so eminent an artist as Herr Max Pauer as orchestral pianist.

It will be remembered that Von Hofmannsthal's 'M. Jourdain' finds himself the patron of two spectacles, the serious 'Ariadne auf Naxos' and the comic 'Zerbinetta und ihre vier Liebhaber,' and that he orders them to be presented simultaneously. The Times correspondent writes:

The curtain rises upon a scene of extravagantly luxuriant coconut palms, and at once we get the strangest incongruity between Ariadne in her Greek draperies and her naiads and dryads, who are nymphs of the Louis XIV. period. Her music, both in the lament which opens the opera and in the love scene with Bacchus, is Strauss in the earnest vein of 'Elektra'—although very much simpler and indeed generally quite diatonic. The trio of the Louis XIV. nymphs is Strauss amusing himself with the conventions of operatic concerted music; and in the Zerbinetta scenes we get the Strauss of 'Der Rosenkavalier'—or perhaps we should rather say the Strauss of Madame Margarethe Siems, for without her one can scarcely suppose that this music would have been written at all. Was ever a song filled with such wonderful coloratur as the one which Strauss has written for her here and the wordless cadenza which follows it? The old coloratur singers embroidered in conventional patterns; Strauss's far-flung arabesques come from the voice of Madame Siems as though she were making them up at the moment, and they suggest that even he can scarcely find enough for her wonderful voice to do . . . . It is part of the plan that the singers in the young composer's opera should entirely ignore the frivolous interruptions of Zerbinetta and her troupe. The work is elaborately staged according to Herr Reinhardt's method, as though for a serious representation of 'Ariadne'; and the beauty of the last scene, when the grotto of vine branches encloses the lovers and stars shine out in an azure night sky, makes it genuinely impressive; but no sooner is the impression made than Zerbinetta comes tripping on, with her song about her own many lovers, turning all to a laugh again. At one moment one is ready to let it all go by as a mere jeu d'esprit—Strauss amusing himself with his technical mastery, and determined that there shall be no settled plot or dramatic purpose to come between the display and the audience; then again at another moment he seems to be speaking seriously in spite of all the ridiculous confusion.

In a second article the critic deals with an important duet sung by Ariadne and Bacchus:

In this duet Strauss gives us a really big melody which deserves comparison with that of the second act of 'Tristan.' This does not mean that, like a hundred and one works by innumerable composers which owe their whole existence to 'Tristan,' this scene copies the mannerisms which it is so easy to copy, but simply that it has something of the same width of range. It might equally be compared with the monologue which ends Strauss's own 'Salome.' The declamation is wonderfully eloquent, and it is no small part of its eloquence that the voices are heard with such ease above the orchestral music. Yet, so far from being conscious of any thinness in the orchestral sound on account of the smallness of the orchestra, the texture of the music at the climax seems as complex and as richly composed of many strands of colour as in any of Strauss's works for a large orchestra. Here one is directly conscious of each component part, and the ear gains in quality far more than it loses in quantity. If only the opera stopped with the closing of the branches around Ariadne and Bacchus one would leave it with a sigh of content, but, as has been said already, there are both Zerbinetta and Jourdain to be reckoned with afterwards. These elements seem to be irreconcilable, no matter from what point of view we look at the work, and if the opera never gains the hold upon a large public which the earlier ones have gained, it will be largely through the strange incongruity of its dramatic elements.

In a third article the critic considers the work as a whole:

It strikes one very forcibly with regard to Strauss's 'Ariadne auf Naxos' that it could only have been written for and successfully produced in a country where opera and drama are both very much at home, where they live side by side and are both quite normal forms of artistic activity. For this reason one scarcely expects it to be brought to England, or, if it were given here by some enterprising experimentalist, one feels fairly certain that it would only be given to satisfy the natural curiosity which every work by Strauss and Hofmannsthal arouses, and that when once that was done there would be nothing more heard of it. It presupposes a keener interest in stagecraft for its own sake than is likely to be found in this country. Its dramatic plan is polyphonic in much the same way that Strauss's musical style is polyphonic in the critics' part of 'Ein Heldenleben' or the scene of Don Quixote's derangement. There is no single line of predominant interest to which the other interests subordinate themselves, no essential plot carried out to its conclusion. As we suggested in an earlier article, one motive of the action obliterates another. It is evidence of the sanity of Strauss's judgment that in these circumstances he should have resisted the temptation to indulge in the corresponding complexities of musical style, and that he should have kept his score comparatively simple. No doubt he realised that to do anything else would be to bring about chaos. . . . . In a comedy set to music the drama naturally bears less responsibility, but in the case of 'Ariadne' it bears none. We have to look to the music to give unity of expression to the multiform ideas of the drama, instead of following the more normal process of finding in the music the multiform expression of the dramatic unity. This implies a mental agility on the part of the hearers which is hardly to be expected where the combination of music and drama is generally looked upon as an occasional entertainment, where the theatre means one thing and the opera another.

The November issue of S.I.M. (La Revue Musicale de la Société Internationale de la Musique) provides, as usual, a store of interesting matter. M. André Suarès writes both fancifully and thoughtfully upon 'L'homme qui improvise.' M. Robert Chauvelot contributes an article upon the music and dances of certain countries of the extreme East. Of chief importance, however, is a long and copiously-illustrated article by M. Charles van den Borren upon the English Virginalists and the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book. He deplores the fact that no enthusiast has yet seen fit to collate the manuscripts of Virginal music that exist in various European collections and libraries, and extols the work of Mr. Fuller Maitland and Mr. Barclay Squire, in their new edition of the Fitzwilliam Book. The writer considers first the instrument, then the composers of the Virginal school, and proceeds to a close analysis of the music. He devotes special attention to the many curious instances of ambiguous rhythm and of false relation. In one example of the latter practice he finds a foreshadowing of Moussorgsky!

M. Emile Vuillermoz, in the same volume, makes the Strauss Festival at Stuttgart the peg for an amusing and fantastic word-picture of Strauss's position with regard to his French contemporaries. The author writes:

We were cultivating the art of the mot juste, the study of exact detail, the luxury of perfect appropriateness; we relished thoughts exchanged in half-suggestion; we had a common pride in discovering the secret of poetry that does not raise its voice, of pathos that does not gesticulate . . . But someone came to disturb the feast. The door of our salon burst open noisily, a loud and authoritative voice was heard in the ante-room, stout nailed boots fastened upon the carpet, and Richard Strauss, a heavy trunk in hand, made his entry.

The newcomer laughs uproariously at their refinements, and then sets to work. He executes all sorts of wild capers, sweeps aside the little objects of their vanity, bellowing vulgar but 'terribly energetic' refrains, jumping on the tables in a savage rhythm, coolly extinguishing the candles with revolver shots, and so forth, for three hours, without pausing to breathe. And yet at the end

Many of us could not repress our 'bravos!' and our gentle companions were actually looking with the eye of indulgence upon this Huron.

Coming however to 'Der Rosenkavalier' and 'Ariadne,' the author sees a conversion of Von Hofmannsthal and Strauss to the spirit of gallant witticism, the elegance of a Court, and the atmosphere of 'nuits bergamasques,' a park à la Verlaine peopled with 'donneurs de sérénades' and with 'belles écouteuses. Tircis, Eglé, Clitandre,' &c. . . . . Elektra, Salome, Death and Transfiguration were but regrettable errors of youth! What a loss of time for the mandoline!

Soon however the writer's badinage only thinly veils a real dislike for the level of taste shown in 'Ariadne.' The volume contains also some characteristically French comments upon passing events and things in general by Claude Debussy, Vincent d'Indy, E. Ysaye, Henri Maréchal, and others.

Reference was made in our November issue to the Festival jointly organized by the Incorporated Society of Musicians and the Musical League, to take place at Birmingham on December 30 and 31, January 1, 2 and 3. The programmes of the concerts have now been arranged, and are as follows:

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

January 1, at 8.30; and January 2, at 3.30.

Quartet in G minor ... ... J. D. Davis.
Pianoforte quintet ... ...César Franck.
Quartet in D flat ... ... Dohnànyi.
Songs ... ... Mabel Moss.
Fantasie for string quartet ... ... Waldo Warner.
Fantasie for string quartet ... ... Balfour Gardiner.
String quartet, 'Molly on the shore' Percy Grainger.

Artists: Madame Marie Brema, Mr. E. Howard-Jones, and the London String Quartet.

CHORAL CONCERT.

January 3, at 4.30.

Choral Symphony, 'Atalanta in Calydon' (unaccompanied) } Granville Bantock.
'Rhapsodie,' for contralto solo and male-voices Brahms.
'The Reveille,' for male-voices ... ... Elgar.
'The Exiles' } for female-voices { de Rillé.
'The Spanish Gipsy Girl' } for female-voices { Lassen.
'Sound sleep' } for female-voices { Vaughan Williams.

The Liverpool Welsh Choral Union, the Manchester Orpheus Glee Society, and the Gitana Ladies' Choir (400 voices). Conductor: Mr. Harry Evans.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERT.

January 3, at 8.15.

Festival Overture ... ... Arnold Bax.
Fantasie for orchestra ... H. Balfour Gardiner.
Suite, 'Beni-Mora' ... ...G. von Holst.
Songs ... ... Frederic Austin.
Frederic Austin.
'Othello,' Prelude to Act IV. ... ...H. A. Keyser.
'Cap and bells,' for soprano solo and orchestra E. L. Bainton.
Variations, 'Down among the dead men' Julius Harrison.
Comedy-overture, 'Dr. Merryheart' Havergal Brian.

Conductors: Messrs. Balfour Gardiner, von Holst, H. A. Keyser, Edgar L. Bainton, and Julius Harrison.

An interesting series of articles by Professor C. E. R. Mueller, of Dresden, on editions and analyses of J. S. Bach's 'Wohltemperirte Klavier,' appeared recently in the Allgemeine Musikzeitung. After reviewing all the well-known editions and commentaries, Professor Mueller writes in the most enthusiastic terms of Dr. Iliffe's 'Analysis of Bach's 48 Preludes and Fugues.' We quote from the article as follows: 'This absolutely splendid work differs totally from those above-mentioned. It is published by Novello & Co., in London, and forms No. 56 of their excellent series of Music Primers.' Quoting the views expressed in the preface of the work, the writer concludes thus: 'I consider Iliffe's work so excellent that it would be a pity if it were not translated. We have, as I have already said, many fine analyses in German, but this work is unique. We have nothing to put beside it.'

A discussion as to the metronome rate at which the Trio in Beethoven's ninth Symphony should be played has been renewed recently in The Times. In October, 1911, Sir Charles Stanford wrote a letter to that journal in which he gave reasons for the presumption that the printed metronome rate, semibreve = 116, was a misprint for minim = 116. Now, Mr. Edward Speyer, who has meantime been investigating the matter abroad, writes a long letter to The Times (October 29) in which he contends that it is not clear that Beethoven desired to fix the tempo of the Trio at minim = 116. He caps the account of his investigations by quoting the following passage from Schindler's biography of the composer (4th edition, vol. ii., p. 250):

Beethoven asked me to copy for London the list of metronome marks (for the ninth Symphony) which a few days before had been made out for Mainz, but the original paper could not be found, the matter was pressing, and he was obliged therefore to undertake this unpleasant business once more. The task, however, was hardly finished when I found the paper with the original notations again. A comparison showed a deviation in all the movements, upon which Beethoven, furious, exclaimed: 'No metronome at all! Whoever has the right feeling (Gefühl) does not require it, and to him who has not got that it is useless, for such an one could not help being run away with by the whole of the orchestra!'

Sir Charles Stanford in a reply (November 5) declares that the main contention of his 1911 letter was that it should be perfectly clear that the minim of the Trio should be at the same rate as the dotted minim of the Scherzo, whether that rate be 116, 118, 120, or 112. Mr. Speyer, unconvinced, rejoins (November 11) by quoting a letter (dated November 3, 1912) written to him by Professor Hugo Riemann, in which he (Riemann) says:

The difficulty regarding the Trio, according to my feeling, rests upon the fact that Beethoven tried to fix the tempo of the minims instead of that of the semibreves, for in the Trio it is the semibreves, in fact, which determine the beats [Schlagzeiten], as Bülow has rightly recognised. 𝅗𝅥 = 116 is indeed unthinkable and would be destructive of its immanent character; perhaps ♩ = 126 might be right, or rather ♩ = 132; that would be equal to 𝅗𝅥 = 66; ♩ = 116 for the Scherzo, and 𝅗𝅥 = 66 for the Trio seem to me to be the most plausible tempi, whilst I would consider ♩ = 116, equal to 𝅗𝅥 = 58, too slow and dragging.

So, after all, the solution of the enigma is a dependence upon Beethoven's Gefühl and Brahms's Discrezione!

The musical situation in Wales is just now engaging the special attention of many persons interested in the Principality. On November 21 an influentially-attended meeting convened by the Denbighshire Society was held in the Caxton Hall, Westminster, in order to discuss a project to establish a National College of Music in Wales. At present the scheme is in a nebulous stage, and the only definite result of the meeting was the appointment of a special committee to inquire into ways and means. There are apparently some vested interests to consider.

Another matter that has aroused much interest in Welsh musical circles is the resignation by Mr. Granville Bantock of his post as adjudicator at the Royal National Eisteddfod which is to be held at Abergavenny in August, 1913. Mr. Bantock is not satisfied with the quality of the tests chosen for the choirs. The matter is dealt with more fully in our supplement, the Competition Festival Record.

REVIVAL OF MACKENZIE'S 'COLOMBA.'

This opera, which was produced at Drury Lane Theatre on April 9, 1883, by the Carl-Rosa Opera Company, is to be performed on the afternoon of December 9, at His Majesty's Theatre, by the Royal College of Music. This spontaneous and graceful act is a striking proof of the kindly relations existing between the Royal Academy of Music (of which Sir Alexander is Principal) and its great sister institution. Sir Charles Stanford will conduct. The opera, which is founded upon the famous romance by Prosper Mérimée, has recently undergone a thorough revision: the original four acts have been condensed into three, and the text of the libretto in part re-written, with the concurrence of the late author's son, Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer, by Mr. Claude Aveling.

It is interesting to recall the reception the opera had from the public and the musical critics when it was produced by the Carl Rosa Company. The season at Drury Lane was only of four weeks' duration, and 'Colomba' was performed on five occasions and with a crescendo of success to increasingly large audiences, who received the work with unmistakable enthusiasm. So popular was it found, that it was the general opinion that the opera would have enjoyed a long run if the company could have extended their season. The critics hailed the work as the first attempt by a British composer to apply to opera the theories of Wagner. 'Colomba' was soon afterwards performed in German, at Hamburg and Darmstadt. At the former city Frau Rosa Sucher, who sang the principal part, and her companions in the cast, were recalled no fewer than seventeen times.

In these days, when London opera is under a temporary cloud, the revival of this British work has especial interest.

THE MUSICAL INTEREST OF LÜBECK.

Mr. D. C. Parker writes: In the Musical Times for October, Dr. A. W. Wilson, of Ely, drew attention to those parts of Thuringia and Saxony which are associated with Bach. It has always seemed to me that the musician when abroad misses much that is interesting. Dr. Wilson rightly points out the historical fascination of such places as Eisenach, and those who feel a thrill at being put in touch with a great past will appreciate his point of view.

In this connection, may I call attention to the town of Lübeck, which also played a part in the wonderful career of Bach? Lübeck has a long and interesting history. Its prosperity came into being by reason of the efforts of Henry the Lion, Duke of Saxony. Like other towns which belonged to the Hanseatic League, its trade and commerce grew enormously, and by virtue of its proximity to the Baltic it did a large business with the northern countries.

Any musician who cares to visit it is sure to be delighted with the little town. It is picturesquely situated on the Trave, and beautiful promenades are now laid out where the old walls of the city stood. Its inhabitants are industrious and thrifty, it is clean, and smokeless; and in the summer, with its red roofs and patches of flowers, it looks charming. The chief centre of interest for the musician is the Marien Kirche, where Buxtehude was organist. (The fact that Buxtehude, though a Dane by birth, settled in Lübeck, is an example of how the town, from its position, was brought into touch with the north.) The church is a large building in the Gothic style. It was to this place that Bach tramped in order to listen to Buxtehude. The latter was brought up in a musical atmosphere, for his father was a noted organist at Helsingör. During his residence in Lübeck his enthusiasm did much to make it the greatest musical centre in the north of Germany. He organized performances the value of which can scarcely be over-estimated. Of these Spitta writes at length in his 'Life of Bach.' Buxtehude's seed fell on good ground, for the burghers of Lübeck responded heartily to his efforts, and he found himself surrounded by several young musicians of talent.

For those who hold that tradition has much to do with music, the present status of Lübeck as a musical centre is interesting. Considering its size (it has some 75,000 inhabitants), the musical scheme advertised at the beginning of this winter is ambitious. It includes operas by Gluck, Mozart, Wagner, Puccini, Strauss, and Wolf-Ferrari. All these are to be given in the New Theatre, which is up-to-date in arrangements and fittings. It will thus be seen that the devotion of Buxtehude to his art has not been without an effect, felt after long years.

HAS PLAINSONG ANY PRACTICAL VALUE TO-DAY?—LECTURE BY R. R. TERRY.

In a lecture delivered to the London section of the I.S.M. on Saturday, November 9, Dr. R. R. Terry asked the question 'What is Plainsong?' The text-books of our youth, he said, told us that it was a species of obsolete chanting used in the Roman Church, founded on eight scales or modes, four of which were invented by St. Ambrose and four added by St. Gregory: that it flourished in the Dark Ages until its barbarisms gave place to part-music. In the popular mind, Plainsong was another word for 'Gregorians'; 'Gregorians' were a something which was the antithesis of 'Anglicans,' and were derived, some said, from the Greeks, and others from the Hebrews. The latter hypothesis apparently found most favour, for it was held that in the historic interview between David and Saul, the former sang 'Gregorians' to the monarch, with disastrous results. These legendary accounts were disposed of by the lecturer, who proceeded to answer in detail the equally fallacious statements that Plainsong was crude, barbarous, obsolete, formless, rhythmless, ponderous, and unvocal. To understand any form of art one must see it with the eyes, or hear it with the ears, of the century which produced it. Criticism of mediæval music in the light of the major and minor scales, the rhythm of barred music, and with ears attuned only to modern harmonic progressions, was futile. Our major and minor scales were not a fixed law of the universe; they were barely three hundred years old. They meant nothing to an Oriental, and even in our Western civilization we had composers who to-day announced their intention of 'abolishing keys.' Plainsong was once a living art, and no cultured musician could afford to shut off periods of his art into water-tight compartments and say, 'This will I recognise, and that will I discard.' Imagine an architect declining to study Greek or Byzantine art, and scoffing at it as 'obsolete'; yet one constantly heard musicians scoffing at all music previous to Bach. Imagine a literary man sneering at Dante or Chaucer, or a painter sneering at Memling or Van Eyck as 'mediæval' products of 'the Dark Ages,' and one realized the absurdity of the position. The golden age of Plainsong was the age of our Gothic Cathedrals. Was it rational to suppose it could be described as barbaric?

Granted Plainsong to be worthy of study, the first step to the understanding of it was to realise what the Modes were. The second step was to eschew the popular text-book explanations of them. An amusing account was given of the lecturer's early struggles in Plainsong accompaniment in the light of text-book learning. One must learn to think in the Modes—in Plainsong idiom—otherwise one was in the position of the Englishman who spent long years in studying French as taught in our Public Schools, and then proceeded to Boulogne to find that he and the inhabitants were unintelligible to each other. The popular explanation of the Modes—beginning on certain notes of the pianoforte and being confined to the white keys—was shown to be misleading, as was indeed any attempt to connect them with the keyboard. The structure of authentic and plagal Modes was explained, and examples given of melodies formed on them. Among their chief characteristics were: (1) Authentic Modes had the dominant a fifth above the final, except Mode III., in order to avoid the tritone; (2) Plagal modes had the dominant a third above the final, except (for the same reason) Modes IV. and VIII.; (3) In authentic Modes, the melody tended to ascend, in the plagal to descend; (4) Progressions [illustrated] occurred in authentic Modes, seldom or never found in plagal, and vice-versa; (5) In authentic Modes the melody generally moved stepwise to the final, in the plagal generally by skip.

The rhythm of Plainsong was still a debated point, as was natural in the case of any art revived after its principles of interpretation had been obscured by long disuse. The scientific study of Plainsong was not much more than twenty-five years old. Previous to that, most recognised manuals of Plainsong were written in the light of the spurious Medicean text of the 16th century. Tribute was paid to Helmore and other pioneers who revived interest in Plainsong, but it was pointed out that their labours (based on a spurious text) could not be other than in vain. To understand Plainsong we must go back to ancient MSS. which were in use when it was a living art, before the days of the printing press, and not to a 16th century printed text now dismissed by all scholars as spurious. The monks of Solesmes had now collated a sufficient number of MSS. for us to form a fairly accurate idea of what Plainsong really was. The work of Wagner and Gastoué was alluded to, and Widor was quoted in support of the lecturer's contention that now that archivists had (more or less) done their work, the time had come for some attempt at a working hypothesis as to interpretation of the text. The archivist must be a blind guide unless he was also a fully-equipped musician. But the musician could make use of the archivist's material, and it was to the musician so equipped that we must look for the final solution.

The necessity of a modal accompaniment to Plainsong was demonstrated. Nature abhorred a hybrid, and of all hybrids a modal melody with modern harmonies was the most fearsome. The chief point of contrast between modal and modern music was that in the latter the object was to increase and stimulate interest until the cadence: to have as few perfect cadences as possible if one would avoid puerility. The opposite was the case in Plainsong; the more points of repose one had the better; the essence of Plainsong was the repose of meditation, and this must not be disturbed by the accompaniment.

Illustrations of syllabic and melismatic chant were artistically sung by Mr. A. Thorogood, accompanied by the lecturer, who in conclusion summed up the chief advantages to a musician of the study of Plainsong: (1) It was essentially ecclesiastical in character, and still remained the only 'official' music of the Roman rite. Its study would therefore engender that feeling for ecclesiastical style so little cultivated to-day; (2) It would enable the student to think in melodic as opposed to harmonic idiom. This would prove a wholesome corrective to the aimless successions of chords which too often did duty for extemporisation; (3) It would enable him to think in modal idiom, and thus reveal the beauties of Palestrina and his school to ears hitherto attuned only to modern harmonic progressions; (4) It would throw a flood of light on the study of counterpoint as it existed when it was a living art, and before it had become hybridised by 18th-century schoolmasters; (5) It would make clear the original reasons for certain contrapuntal rules which, under present-day harmonic conditions, appear unjustifiable. In a word, it was essentially Church music, and its study would produce Church musicians of surer grip and wider culture than those to whom it was a sealed book.

Church and Organ Music.

THE PEDAL ORGAN. (Second Article.)*

By George Dixon.

It is more than a quarter of a century since the present writer first began to take an interest in the organ. Some stray articles by the late Mr. Thomas Casson, on the design of the instrument in general, and the Pedal organ in particular, which appeared about that time, helped to stimulate that interest, till it has become an enthusiasm. New developments have not only been studied with eagerness, but have also been frequently commented on. The views thus expressed from time to time have no claim to originality. Nevertheless, candid criticism of those ideas which were considered to be wrong, and unflinching advocacy of methods which seemed to be right, appear to have been not without effect in the organ-building world. Under these circumstances then, criticism, seriously undertaken, of the proposals of a professional musician on such a subject may not have been regarded as altogether inopportune. If this be the case, attention may be legitimately called to a few further comments which Dr. Froggatt's reply in the June number of the Musical Times invites.†

If there is anything in Dr. Hopkins's contention that the Pedal should possess its own characteristic tone-quality, in addition to the purely bass-forming function, it cannot logically be denied an individual harmonic structure. Again, as the Pedal is very rarely used in chords, it is possible to treat such independent mutation ranks considerably more boldly than those of the corresponding manual compound stops. There is no more difficulty in voicing such a Pedal mixture so as to blend properly with those of the manuals, than there is in getting two manuals of different tone-qualities—one of which may be registered for solo purposes—to blend together when coupled. As the question in dispute is not the actual provision of a variety of Pedal basses for the softer manual combination, but the method of such provision, the remark in italics about the use of the open wood uncoupled as such a bass, is hardly relevant to the discussion. Dr. Froggatt's original article quite rightly emphasised the importance of the provision of Pedal solo effects,

* Lieut.-Colonel Dixon's first article on the Pedal Organ appeared in our issue for April, 1912. Articles on the same subject by Dr. A. T. Froggatt appeared in February and June, 1912.—(Ed., M. T.) and curiously enough said nothing further about this subject. It is now implied that where the tuba is absent, a heavy Pedal with reed cannot be used against the full Great without reeds. It seems doubtful indeed whether such a combination is even possible when the fourth manual is actually present, for how, under the system, is the tuba (bass) to be added to the full flue-work on the Pedal unless it be coupled to the Great at the same time?

† Apologies are due to Dr. Froggatt and the readers of the Musical Times for the belated appearance of this article. It was originally drafted in June, but owing to pressure of military work during the training season, it had to be temporarily put aside unfinished. It should, of course, be read in conjunction with Dr. Froggatt's June article.—G. D.

This is scarcely the place to enter into a detailed discussion of the registration of organ fugues. It may, however, be pointed out that any player on the pianoforte who wished to give an intelligent rendering of a fugue would not hesitate to emphasise the entry of the subject, whether it occurred in the bass or any other part. How is the case altered, where the organ is concerned? Surely such method of interpretation is sometimes not only legitimate but even desirable where it can be conveniently applied.* In the organ at St. Mary Redcliffe, Bristol, a reversible piston, actuating the Pedal ophicleide, is provided. Two at least of the eminent players who gave opening recitals there a few months ago evidently do not share Dr. Froggatt's views, as they were not slow to avail themselves of this contrivance. On several occasions the fugue subject was emphasised on the Pedal reed with fine effect, the stop being withdrawn immediately the ordinary bass was resumed. With regard to the inner parts the same argument applies, though it is seldom possible to put it into practice except in those rare instances where the instrument is provided with the double touch. However, leaving the question of fugue-playing aside, it would be interesting to know how Bach's choral preludes such as 'Valet will ich dir Geben,' with the Canto fermo in the Pedal, which seem to demand at the same time a loud organ in contrast for the manual part, are to be rendered. Lastly, what is to be said of perhaps the most stupendous of all Bach's organ works, if not in the whole realm of pure organ music—the great Passacaglia? Here, although the reed may be required only occasionally, the Pedal tone must surely predominate over the manual during more than half the piece, otherwise what becomes of the subject on which the whole composition is built?

Let us now turn to more modern times. In Mendelssohn it is only necessary to allude to the Pedal choral, 'Aus tiefer Noth,' in the third Sonata, and the first section of the last variation in the sixth Sonata, where a reed appears to be demanded on the Pedal apart from the manuals. Finally, reference may be made to Rheinberger, a composer certainly not given to elaborate registration. In the last movement of the sixth Sonata, in E flat minor, he actually directs Posaune 16 ft. where the fugue subject enters in augmentation on the Pedal. Now, all these illustrations can be effectively rendered with facility on the ordinary three-manual organ of thirty stops quoted by Dr. Froggatt at the outset—nay, they may even be adequately performed on a smaller instrument of two manuals, provided it contain a Pedal reed. Surely any system of organ design and control which claims superiority, but at the same time fails, possibly even in its most elaborate form, to provide easily such stock registration required for the adequate rendering of well-known examples of classical organ music, stands self condemned, whatever advantages it may offer.

* This passage was written before the first volume of the new critical edition of Bach's Organ Works edited by Schweitzer and Widor had appeared. It is only fair to state that these authorities seem to some extent to support Dr. Froggatt's contention; but even they allow the player to exercise his discretion in the use of the Pedal reed.—G. D.

Again, for trio playing, ordinary two-manual organs, except the humblest, provide some such combination as: Man. I., Salicional 8 ft., Man. II., Reed 8 ft., Pedal Sub-bass 16 ft. and Flute 8 ft. No system ought to deny such possibilities of contrasted registration in small instruments, where it is most important that the very utmost should be made of the limited resources at command.

With regard to the simple experiment which Dr. Froggatt proposes, let any one try it, selecting the first eighteen bars of Bach's great G minor Fugue as an example. Play this on the Great organ open diapason, first with the Pedal part as written, using the open wood, and again with the Pedal part an octave lower, using the Great to Pedal coupler alone. In the latter case the majority of listeners, unless well acquainted with the work, would miss the Pedal entry, and would scarcely be conscious of any Pedal effect whatever. The single low A which occurs would have perforce to be omitted, but that does not affect the argument.

This illustration also serves to show that if the Pedal is to be really effective throughout its compass, the Great bass is also quite as essential in its upper register as it is below tenor C. The point, moreover, is not that there is no alternative between the Great bass and no bass at all on the Pedal, for, with trifling exceptions which do not count, every instrument containing the open wood possesses at least one soft Pedal stop. The real question is whether, in addition to a variety of softer basses, the large-scaled open wood should be retained, in spite of Mr. Casson's strictures, as the characteristic foundation stop of the Pedal organ. So far from being undesirable above tenor C, its upward extension into the 8-ft. octave is invaluable. The octave wood not only provides an effective solo stop, but it binds together the whole Pedal ensemble in a manner attainable by no other register.

The criticism of the Doncaster Pedal had reference to the general lack of effect in relation to the rest of the organ, and did not of course apply to the individual stops, which may be all that the late Dr. Hopkins claimed for them.

As Dr. Froggatt expressly declares the Great bass to be a luxury—nay, even a monstrosity—except in very large organs, there does not seem to be much point in trying to prove the existence of its manual counterpart. The English Great bass bears no relation to any manual stop (except perhaps the Hope-Jones Tibia), least of all to the real manual diapason tone. The claims put forward for this relation are somewhat misleading, and mainly rest on the confusion caused by the indiscriminate use of the term 'diapason' to describe alike the metal manual and the Pedal wood tone. It is of course quite true that the former class of stop has been successfully made in wood either wholly or in part, witness for example the Smith diapason, still extant at Auckland Castle, or Schulze's beautiful wood basses to the Great diapasons at Armley. These examples are, however, not large-scaled heavy flutes like the Great bass, but real diapason quality, barely distinguishable from metal tone. Curiously enough the stop labelled 'Open diapason' (wood) on the Great organ at St. Paul's Cathedral, hardly differs from Willis's ordinary claribel flute. It is very small in scale compared with the Pedal open wood, and in no sense its manual counterpart.

Dr. Froggatt originally claimed economy as well as simplification and saving of space. The remarks made concerning the necessity of separate soundboards, actions, and trunking, cannot therefore have been so entirely beside the mark as he appears to imagine, for it now looks as if these claims have been virtually abandoned.

Concerning the provision of the 32 ft. on the Pedal, it has been previously pointed out that this stop is now almost universally obtained by adding twelve pipes to one of the existing Pedal 16-ft. Pedal stops, so that thirty are not required. The Great bass is generally chosen, as its downward extension gives us by far the most useful and effective 32-ft. tone we possess. Adding twelve pipes to the Great Double need not be any less costly, and would probably be more expensive unless that register be already used as a Pedal stop in 16-ft. pitch. So far as saving of space and expense are concerned, it has been shown that by borrowing manual doubles in identical pitch, a variety of soft basses suitable for use with Swell and Choir stops can be obtained at small increase of cost, without adding any pipes whatever. As the great advantages claimed by Dr. Froggatt are the provision of such a variety of soft basses, and the utilisation of large manual pipes seldom otherwise employed, such borrowing of manual doubles has a very real bearing on his system.

With regard to the undue enlargement of the 8-ft. manual diapason in the lower part of the compass making the Pedal appear relatively weaker than it really is, Dr. Froggatt's contrary opinion is obviously true only when the Pedal under his system is used alone in single notes. There is no contradiction, however, in stating that such a Pedal would appear relatively weak in its upper register whilst playing on the Great diapason, especially if the left hand, as sometimes happens, descends below the Pedal part itself. A Pedal entry under such circumstances could manifestly not be recognised as such. All this emphasises the importance of the Great bass to give the necessary point to the Pedal entry in such cases, as may be proved by trying the experiment previously alluded to.

It is satisfactory to note that Dr. Froggatt does not after all desire the entire abolition of independent Pedal stops. It may, however, be permissible to quote his own words as given in his first article :—'However, for my own part, these entirely independent Pedal stops, except perhaps in the case of very large organs, seem to be superfluous.' As this passage occurred after he had stated that one or more independent stops apparently of a soft character might, under certain circumstances, be included, it seemed scarcely unfair to take the passage quoted as representing his own final opinion. Misunderstandings would probably have been avoided if 'large' and 'very large' organs had been more clearly defined.

If he is really prepared to admit, as a general rule, such independent Pedal stops as the Great bass and the Pedal reed, and their extensions, as well as the borrowing of manual doubles to form a variety of soft basses, then the method he advocates might usefully be employed to supplement the resources of the Pedal organ. Needless to say, the plan of combining all these methods is—barring the inclusion of the Great bass—the one formulated by Mr. Casson. It has been carried out successfully by one or two of our more enlightened builders, and has been adopted in the organ alluded to by Mr. Kenneth Burns.

In the matter of Pedal control, it is not clear whether Dr. Froggatt claims any advantage over Mr. Casson's system or not. So far as can be judged from the description given by the former, Mr. Casson's system appears to accomplish not only everything that Dr. Froggatt requires, but a great deal more besides. It provides for the control of independent Pedal stops and couplers ; it also allows free hand registration, and supplies Pedal solo effects regardless of the number of manuals and the size of the instrument.

In theory it may be correct to extend every manual stop an octave below the present compass, but for the reasons already stated it cannot be right to allow such a plan to displace foundation registers which are or ought to be characteristic of the Pedal organ itself. In practice, such wholesale extensions would scarcely ever be possible, even if they were really required.

It has been well said that an ounce of practice is worth a ton of theory. If the criticisms which have been made concerning the system proposed by Dr. Froggatt are not justified, then there should be no difficulty in persuading organ-builders and players to take the matter up. Until, however, an organ of reasonable size has been built embodying the system so that it can be put to thoroughly practical tests, there seems to be but little object in discussing the matter further.

We should remind our readers of the special Advent Service which will be held in St. Paul's Cathedral on Tuesday, December 3, at 7 p.m., when Brahms's 'Requiem' will be sung, accompanied by a full orchestra. It would be impossible to imagine surroundings more appropriate to such a service, while the fact that the Cathedral choir is to be entirely responsible for the choral part must ensure a splendid performance. We were present on the last similar occasion, and were deeply impressed by the intensely devotional character of the whole service.

Sir George Martin, will, of course, conduct, and to him belongs the honour of having firmly established these important and helpful services. If the Cathedral were to be as crowded as at the singing of the 'Last Judgment,' we should become quite hopeful of the raising of popular taste, fine as 'Spohr's' work undoubtedly is. It should be added that no tickets will be required.

At Holy Trinity Church, Ventnor, on November 7, Mr. Edwin Lemare received a presentation accompanied by the following address :

To our beloved friend and organist,
Mr. Edwin Lemare.

In this year when we have been keeping the fiftieth anniversary of the consecration of our church it is impossible that we should forget the debt due to him who has for 50 years rendered such faithful and valued service as organist in that church, and it is therefore our desire that the accompanying cheque may be accepted by you as a small token of our gratitude and also of the esteem and affection which your loyal service during those many years has won.

The fourth annual dinner of the Free Church Musicians' Union was held at the Hotel Great Central, London, W., on Saturday, November 2. Dr. Coward, as president, was in the chair, and was supported by Dr. J. D. McClure, Dr. Leonard Fowles, the Rev. E. P. Powell, the Rev. Wesley Woolmer, Mr. Stephen Collins, M.P., Mr. George Dodds, Mr. J. A. Meale, Mr. F. Heddon Bond, Mr. Horace Holmes, Mr. Fred. Meen, Mr. J. E. Leah (treasurer), and Mr. H. F. Nicholls (secretary). The general-secretary, in responding for the Union, stated that they were still able to report progress, and inasmuch as this Society was entirely carried on by voluntary effort, the results they had obtained during the four years of its existence were very gratifying. An invitation to all interested in Free Church music to become members was extended, and it was hoped in the New Year that the Union would at least double its membership. During the evening an excellent programme of music was performed by the Crouch End Congregational Church Choir, under the direction of Mr. Josiah Booth.

A new organ has recently been erected in the First Baptist Church, Calgary, Alberta, by Messrs. Cassavant Frères, St. Hyacinthe, Quebec. We understand the instrument is giving great satisfaction, its beauty of tone and responsive mechanism being remarkable. We give the specification:

The important Annual Festival of the Liverpool Church Choir Association took place on November 21 in St. George's Hall. In addition to the choir of 600 voices, mainly of men and boys, but including ladies, there was a crowded assembly, headed by the Lord Bishop of the Diocese. Special interest attached to the visit of Sir George C. Martin, who came for the second time as the Association's honoured guest. He conducted excellent performances of his majestic Thanksgiving Te Deum in B flat, and anthems 'Rejoice in the Lord' and 'Holiest, breathe an evening blessing' (sung unaccompanied). As a mark of respect to the late Dr. A. L. Peace, his anthem 'Come, and let us go up,' was sung, and the programme concluded with Beethoven's 'Hallelujah.'

Another feature was the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in C, by Dr. W. B. Brierley, which was selected by the adjudicator, Dr. J. C. Bridge, from the compositions sent in anonymously by local composers. This proved a bright and effective work.

The principal soloists were Master Reginald Pearce and Messrs. Donald Reid, Frank Webster, and Greeves Johnson, of St. Paul's Cathedral choir. Brass instruments and drums supplemented the organ accompaniments, played by Dr. A. W. Pollitt and Mr. Branscombe.

Generally speaking the success of the Festival quite sustained the high reputation of the long series, and credit is due to the choirs and choirmasters concerned, and also to Mr. Ralph H. Baker, the invaluable hon. secretary.

On November 8, at Emmanuel Church, Guthrie Road, Bristol, there was a Festival of the Clifton Deanery in connection with the Bristol Diocesan Choral Union. The choirs which took part were the following: Emmanuel, St. Saviour, Christ Church, St. John the Evangelist, St. Michael, St. Matthew, St. Nathaniel, St. Alban, and St. Katharine. Mr. John Barrett conducted, and Mr. Dinelli Skelding (organist of Emmanuel) was at the organ. The singing of the Festival service was of gratifying excellence; the anthem was 'Give thanks, O Israel,' by the Rev. Sir F. A. G. Ouseley.

The Annual Service of the United Choirs of Upminster, Hornchurch, Squirrel's Heath, and the Romford churches, was held at St. Edward's, Romford, on October 17, when 'O come, let us worship,' from Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm, was sung, the soloist being Mr. F. P. Hammond; the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis was Stainer in B flat, and the Te Deum, Dykes in F. The service was under the direction of Mr. A. C. Chappell Haverson, Mr. Henry Disney presiding at the organ.

A very interesting organ recital was given on October 17 at St. Nicholas Cole Abbey, by Mr. Herbert Hodge, organist of the church. The programme consisted of the Test-pieces selected for the Royal College of Organists' Examination in January, 1913. Such a performance must be of great educational value, and of considerable help to intending candidates who may have been present.

On November 20, at All Saints' Church, a performance of Haydn's oratorio, 'The Creation,' was sung by Dr. Abram's Musical Union, assisted by the members of the choir. The principal soloists were: Mrs. Strickland, Mr. A. Winter, and Messrs R. Abraham and G. H. Green. The organist was Mr. Henry Poole, and Dr. Abram conducted.

Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' was given at the Broomwood Wesleyan Church, by a choir of 100 voices, on October 30. The soloists were Miss Maude Willby, Miss Wilhelmine Fink, Mr. Vivian Bennetts, and Mr. Bertram Mills. Mr. Allan Brown presided at the organ, and Mr. G. Harold Paine was the conductor.

At the recent Municipal contests in London, Mr. Francis Burgess, the musical director of the Gregorian Association, headed the poll in the election of members to the Kensington Borough Council (St. Charles's Ward).

Mr. Henry R. Bird, Organist of St. Mary Abbots, Kensington, begs to announce his change of address to 6, Pembroke Road, Kensington, W. Telephone, 2450 Western.

Reviews.

Dr. Arne and 'Rule, Britannia.' By William Hayman Cummings, Mus. Doc.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Dr. W. H. Cummings is already well known as a painstaking investigator in musical biography, and although an octogenarian he is not spending his days in richly-earned 'leisured ease,' but is still contributing to make straight the crooked paths of English musical history. It is a far cry back to 1847 when Dr. Cummings sang, as an alto, in Mendelssohn's 'Elijah,' he being at that date organist of Waltham Abbey, and ever since he has been enriching British music in many ways, notably by his advocacy of Purcell, whose biography he wrote for the 'Great Musicians' series, and by numerous standard works.

The bicentenary of Dr. Arne two years ago furnished an opportunity of reviving selections from the works of that great English musician, and it was felt by many that the time had come for an adequate memoir of the man who composed 'Rule, Britannia.' At the time numerous articles were published dealing with various phases of the musical activity of Arne, but these merely whetted one's appetite for an authoritative life. Now, at length, Dr. Cummings has given us a biography of Arne, the result of diligent research, and has presented his narrative in a most attractive manner. The format of the book is delightful, and is worthy of the contents.

The composer of 'Rule, Britannia' was born in King Street, Covent Garden, in 1710, and was educated at Eton College. Dr. Burney's description of young Arne practising on 'a miserable, common cracked flute' must not be taken seriously, as Dr. Cummings rightly points out, for, from the painting by Gainsborough (reproduced), Burney must have been slightly exaggerating.

As a composer Arne may be said to have made his début in Addison's 'Rosamund,' on March 7, 1733, and this success he followed up with the burletta of 'Tom Thumb' on May 31, 1733. He married Cecilia Young in 1736, and the fair songstress soon after became a Catholic, the faith of her husband. The Masque of 'Comus,' in 1738, was a palpable hit, and at once established the fame of Arne. 'Alfred' was given at Cliefden, on August 1, 1740, and 'Rule, Britannia' was first heard by the privileged crowd invited by the Prince of Wales to his lovely gardens in Buckinghamshire. Dr. Cummings prints a facsimile of the original printed score of this 'celebrated Ode'; and he writes that the first public performance of 'Rule, Britannia' was at the Theatre Royal, Smock Alley, Dublin, on March 10, 1744; it was not heard in London till March, 1745.

Dr. Cummings gives ample details of the more important performances of 'Alfred,' and he quotes the use made of 'Rule, Britannia' by Handel, Beethoven, and Wagner. It may, however, be well to note that Dr. Burney makes the extraordinary statement that Arne took his theme from the close of 'Cedo allo sorte,' the first air in 'Giustino,' produced on February 16, 1737. Wagner declared that the first eight notes of Arne's celebrated Ode embodied the whole character of the British people, and in 1837 he wrote his 'Rule, Britannia' Overture, the score of which was recovered by a lucky accident in May, 1904.

Most interesting details are furnished by Dr. Cummings of Mr. and Mrs. Arne's visit to Dublin in 1741-42, and the learned author rightly surmises that 'Comus' had previously been heard in the Irish metropolis; as a matter of fact, it was given at Aungier Street Theatre with Quin, Kitty Clive, Lucy Ryan, &c., on August 6, 1741—the music being arranged from Arne's score by Dubourg. Handel himself was in Dublin at the time of Arne's visit, and Arne's sister (Mrs. Cibber) had sung at the first production of the immortal 'Messiah.' Moreover, as noted by Dr. Cummings, Arne selected many excerpts from Handel' works for performance in Dublin, and he used the same Music Hall in Fishamble Street, so praised by Handel for its acoustic properties. The Arne season was continued in Dublin in 1742-43, and again in 1743-44, during which Dr. Arne showed his versatility as composer, harpsichordist, violinist, and actor, as well as conductor. Among the novelties presented was the oratorio, 'The death of Abel, on February 18, 1744, an excerpt from which, 'The hymn of Eve,' is still sung; in fact, it is included, under the title of 'Uxbridge,' in 'Hymns Ancient and Modern.'

The early precocity of Arne's son Michael is dealt with. He appeared as early as April 2, 1750, at Galli's benefit, at the Little Theatre in the Haymarket, and his début as a composer was on the 17th of the same month, at Miss Falkner's benefit at Covent Garden. Dr. Cummings tells us that Michael Arne's beautiful song, 'The lass with a delicate air,' is sometimes ascribed in error to his father.

In 1755, Dr. Arne arranged the music for an operatic version of 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' by Garrick, which was duly produced at Drury Lane Theatre. In the autumn of the same year, Arne and his wife again visited Dublin, and a new opera, 'Eliza,' was produced on November 29, by command of His Excellency the Marquis of Hartington. Arne left Dublin in June, 1756, never to return. But worse still, it appears that the composer deserted his wife at the same date, and only became reconciled to her in 1770.

On July 6, 1759, the University of Oxford conferred upon Arne the degree of 'Doctor in Music,' and in December following he composed 'Thomas and Sally.' The oratorio 'Judith' was produced at Drury Lane Theatre on February 27, 1761, and met with undoubted success, it being repeated on March 4 and 6, and again during the Lenten season of 1762. The full score of this oratorio, in Arne's handwriting, is now in the British Museum. In connection with 'Judith,' it is of interest to mention that at a performance at Covent Garden Theatre on May 16, 1767, a pianoforte was heard for the first time in public, played by Mr. Charles Dibdin, the composer of 'Tom Bowling.' Arne, taking a cue from Handel, introduced 'The hymn of Eve,' from 'The death of Abel,' into 'Judith'; it occurs as the introduction to Act 3. This oratorio was again given at the Shakespeare Festival at Stratford on Avon, in 1769, on September 6, conducted by Arne, on which occasion Mrs. Barthelemon, Mrs. Baddeley, Mr. Vernon, Mr. Champness (the original singer of 'Heart of Oak') and Master Brownacre were the vocalists, and, at the end of the first Act, Mr. Barthelemon played a solo on the violin.

'Artaxerxes,' produced at Covent Garden on February 2, 1762, was an instantaneous success, and was popular for over a century. It had an equal success in Dublin in 1765, and Tenducci sang so well that he captivated an Irish heiress, Miss Maunsell, whom he married in the autumn of 1766, and who sang the part of Mandane, in Edinburgh, in 1769.

'Love in a village' and 'The Guardian outwitted,' and an Italian opera, 'Olimpiade,' increased Arne's reputation, and he also composed two Masses and some Motets for the Chapel of the Sardinian Embassy. In 1772, he composed 'Squire Badger,' with a new Irish and Scotch Medley Overture, and he set the music to Mason's 'Elfrida' and 'Caractacus.' The latter work has disappeared unaccountably, though the music is said to have been very fine; it was re-set in 1795 by Charles Wesley, but Wesley's music is puerile in the extreme.

It is pleasant to record that Arne and his wife became reconciled shortly before the death of the composer, and the reconciliation was effected by their grand-niece, Cecilia Maria Barthelemon, the daughter of Pollie Young. Arne passed away on March 5, 1778, fortified by all the rites of the Catholic Church, and by his will he bequeathed all his effects to his wife and his son Michael. He was interred in the graveyard of St. Paul's Church, Covent Garden. Mrs. Arne survived him eleven years, and her death took place on October 6, 1789.

It only remains to add that the book is enriched with nine admirable illustrations and two facsimiles. The frontispiece is a portrait of Arne by Dunkarton, and there are three other portraits of the composer reproduced—by Gainsborough, Bartolozzi, and Zoffany. The other illustrations include the Music Hall, Fishamble Street, Dublin, Cliefden House, Mrs. Cibber, Cervetto, and a facsimile of the score of 'Rule, Britannia.' The printing and get-up of the book are irreproachable, and reflect the utmost credit on the firm of Novello. Again, congratulations to Dr. Cummings on his admirable monograph on a composer who, under altered circumstances, might have been a formidable rival of Handel, and who still lives as the composer of 'Rule, Britannia,' 'Where the bee sucks,' and 'Uxbridge.'

Masterpieces of Music. Edited by E. Hatzfeld. [T. C. & E. C. Jack.]

Ten volumes of this attractive series have now been issued. Each volume provides, for the price of 1*s.* 6*d.*, a biographical and critical essay upon a great composer, written by a musician of standing, a short selection of the composer's works, and a portrait. The musical section is as representative as the laws of copyright, convenience, and public requirement allow. Tchaikovsky is represented only by five short pianoforte pieces, and two songs. A fair selection is made from Mozart's works. The three vocal numbers are well-chosen, as are also the pianoforte works, with the exception of the 'Turkish Rondo' from the Sonata in A; symphonic work is represented only by a transcription of the Menuet from the Symphony in E flat. Delightful as this movement is, surely the slow movement from the same Symphony is more so, and is far better adapted for the pianoforte. Most of the musical selection is, however, as well done as circumstances permit.

The literary side of the venture is far more important and useful. Its best features are the essays on Beethoven by Mr. Frederick Corder and on Brahms by Sir Charles Stanford. Mr. Corder, by an extremely able examination of the essentials of Beethoven's style, sets out to establish his premier position amongst all composers. Sir Charles Stanford gives an account of Brahms's place in history that should prove enlightening to the average amateur (for whose benefit this series is devised). Mr. Landon Ronald writes attractively on Schumann and Tchaikovsky; Mr. G. H. Clutsam writes on Schubert; Mr. Corder also deals characteristically with Wagner; and Sir Frederic Cowen contributes clever studies of Haydn, Mendelssohn, Mozart, and Rossini. His essay on the last-named is quite a collection of anecdotes and caricatures. It is a happy characteristic of the biographies in general, for which doubtless the general-editor is responsible, that the personal traits of the composers are dwelt upon.

Second Symphony. In E flat. By Edward Elgar. Arranged for pianoforte duet by Sigfrid Karg-Elert. [Novello & Co., Ltd.]

At first Elgar's second Symphony impresses one as being little adapted for representation in the form of a pianoforte duet, but the impression is reversed when Herr Sigfrid Karg-Elert's version is examined. Of course there are passages that 'play themselves,' but the path of the arranger is not always so smooth. The weird and arresting passage in the development section of the opening movement, which the composer has likened to 'ghostly lovers in a garden,' seems to belong to the orchestra and only to the orchestra, yet it loses little of its ghostliness and strange fascination in the hands of duet players, and the same is true of its disguised reappearance in the third movement. The big crescendo of rushing scales and arpeggios that comes twice in the second movement is another problem that admits of solution. The Scherzo of course has its puzzling moments, as has also the middle section of the Finale, but both lend themselves to elucidation by the process of practising. The amount of effectiveness that remains in Elgar's music when its orchestral colouring is taken away is a tribute to its intrinsic value. There must be few pianists who will study this arrangement without gaining an increased respect for Elgar's technical powers.

Obituary.

We regret to announce the following deaths:

M. EDGAR TINEL, the well-known Belgian composer, who passed away on October 28, at Brussels. He was born in Sinay, in East Flanders, on March 27, 1854. His father was the local organist, and at eight years of age young Tinel, whose musical gifts were revealed early, was able to deputise on the organ for his father. Coming under the notice of Fétis, the famous critic, he was enabled to enter the Brussels Conservatoire, where he became a pupil of Gevaert, Joseph Dupont, and Louis Brassin, the pianist. At eighteen he gained the first-prize for pianoforte-playing. In 1877 he won the Prix de Rome with his oratorio, 'De Klokke Roeland.' In 1881 he succeeded the organist Lemmens as director of the Ecole Interdiocésaine de Musique Sacrée at Malines. It was there that he composed the oratorio 'Franciscus'—a composition which has been performed all over Europe and in America, and is generally regarded as his masterpiece. In 1909 his opera 'Katharina' was produced, and he was appointed to the post of Principal of the Royal Conservatoire. His works also include a great Te Deum, the oratorio 'Sainte-Godelieve,' a Mass for five-part chorus, an Overture and Symphonic Intermezzi to Corneille's 'Polyeucte,' the picturesque little cantata, 'Kollebloemen,' and numerous smaller compositions.

Mr. HENRY HUDSON, organist for nearly forty years of Holy Trinity Church, Southport, died with unexpected suddenness at his residence on November 20. It is fifty years since Mr. Hudson became connected with Holy Trinity Church as a chorister. For some years he was conductor of the Southport and Birkdale Philharmonic Society.

Mr. W. F. C. SCHOTTLER, at Hill Crest, Lansdown, near Bath, on November 19. The deceased, who was forty-nine years of age, was a well-known musician in the West of England. He was director of the orchestra of the Theatre Royal, Bath, bandmaster of the Bath Territorials, and conductor of the Summer Band in the city.

Madame SUSANNA COLE (Mrs. William Offord), at the age of eighty-two. In the 'sixties and 'seventies Madame Cole enjoyed a brilliant career as a solo-singer, an account of which was given in our issue for October.

THE 'HAMMERKLAVIER' SONATA.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—A reviewer of my recently published Essay on Wagner's 'Tristan und Isolde' has taken exception to a note censuring the title 'the Hammerklavier' for Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 106. He alleges that it is Beethoven's own word and is not like 'Pastorelle' or 'Appassionata,' which were affixed by publishers. As the question seems to me one of general interest, I ask permission to raise it in your columns. The facts are these: About the year 1816, i.e., when Europe was breathing again after the Napoleonic wars and a feeling of nationality had begun to revive among the German peoples, a fashion arose of using German words wherever possible in preference to foreign ones, a fashion eagerly adopted by Beethoven and noticeable in the superscriptions of his works about this period. Now the Viennese German for pianoforte was at that time 'Hammerklavier,' i.e., the keyboard with hammers, in distinction to the still common clavichord and clavicembalo with tangents or jacks in the place of hammers. Beethoven therefore gave instructions to his publishers that in future in all his works the German word 'Hammerklavier' should be used instead of 'Pianoforte.' 'Sonate für das Hammerklavier' means nothing more than 'Sonata for the Pianoforte,' and is Beethoven's superscription to the Sonatas Opp. 101, 109, 110, as well as for 106. It is not a distinguishing title of one sonata. The documentary authority for what I write will be found in Thayer-Deiters iii. 499, 500 and iv. 230, 231. If I remember rightly the use of the term as a special title for Op. 106 originated with a Leipsic publisher in a modern edition, and owing to the high reputation of the editor as an executant pianist is in danger of becoming general.

Perhaps it will be answered that a name is only a label, and does not very much matter. I do not think so; on the contrary, I think a misleading title may often be most mischievous. The titles 'Pastorelle' and 'Appassionata' for Opp. 28 and 57, though objectionable because unauthorized, are at least not misleading, whereas 'Hammerklavier' distinctively for Op. 106 is both unauthorized and misleading.—I am, Sir, yours obediently,

GEO. AINSLIE HIGHT.

THE LATE S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.

Mrs. A. Glen Broder, of Calgary, Canada, part of whose letter we print, writes as follows: 'To the lament of the world of music at the early death of a composer of fertile fancy and of a rich vein of originality, the Far-West is entitled to contribute a distinctive note, as one of his most hotly-discussed works, "The Atonement," had in Calgary a first hearing in Canada a few months after its production at the Hereford Festival, and shortly after its performance in New York by the Church Choral Society under the conductorship of Richard Henry Warren.

'Coleridge-Taylor's great work, "Hiawatha," has unfortunately not yet had a hearing in the new provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, which is all the more deplorable as in it the composer has so successfully conveyed the atmosphere of the prairies.

'Expressing lively interest in a strophical version of the "Legend of Qu'Appelle," which he intended to set for tenor voice (he mentioned Mr. Ben Davies as its interpreter), Mr. Coleridge-Taylor asked the present writer for more lyrics to complete a Canadian cycle of six. These, alas! will never now see the light. But though the Canadian West was not destined to have its moods and legends immortalised by so exceptionally imaginative a musician, Calgary claims the right to pay its tribute of admiration to his memory.'

TALLIS'S PSALM SETTINGS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—I have to thank Dr. Madeley Richardson for his letter. The matter to which he calls attention is not, however, very important. In view of the existence of Dr. Richardson's fuller representation of the original, of which I was not aware, Mr. John Heyward's setting out of the Psalm is, I admit, better described, in regard to notation, as abridged or condensed, although the Psalm itself is given in full.

If any of your readers have knowledge of any chants or chant-settings of the period, besides those set out or referred to, I should be glad to hear of them.—Yours faithfully,

S. ROYLE SHORE.

SOUTHPORT.—The fourth of the present series of Bohemian Concerts was given by the Southport Vocal Union on Monday, November 18, in the concert-room of the Prince of Wales Hotel. The choir, which was re-organized in the early part of the year, maintained its high reputation as one of the leading male choirs in the country, and gave a fine interpretation of Hegar's 'Phantom Host,' and part-songs by Mendelssohn, Sullivan, &c., under the conductorship of Mr. J. C. Clarke. All the artists were particularly successful in their songs, but special mention should be made of Miss Gertrude Ferber and Mrs. Beswick for their artistic singing. Mr. E. P. Beaumont accompanied, in his usual able manner.

THE COLERIDGE-TAYLOR MEMORIAL CONCERT.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL, NOVEMBER 22.

It is gratifying to record that this imposing tribute to the memory and achievements of one of the nation's most distinguished composers, whose career was recently so sadly cut short, was an unqualified success. The chief choral and orchestral organizations in the metropolis willingly co-operated to honour the musician whose compositions had yielded them so much delight, and an immense audience readily responded to the appeal. The choir of about 1,100 voices was formed by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society (Sir Frederick Bridge), the Alexandra Palace Choral Society (Mr. Allen Gill), the London Choral Society (Mr. Arthur Fagge), and the Crystal Palace Choir (Mr. W. Hedgcock); and the following orchestras were represented: the London Symphony, the New Symphony, the Royal Amateur, the Stock Exchange, and the Handel Society. The solo artists were Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Esta D'Argo, Madame Ada Crossley, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Gervase Elwes, Mr. Julien Henry, and Mr. Robert Radford. The conductors were Sir Frederick Bridge, C.V.O., Sir Charles Villiers Stanford, Mr. Adolf Schmid, and Mr. Landon Ronald. The following is the full programme:

'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'The Death of Minnehaha.'

Ballade in A minor, for orchestra.

Songs ... ... { 'Unmindful of the roses.' / 'Big lady moon.'

Madame ADA CROSSLEY.

Songs ... ... { 'My love.' / 'Over the hills.'

Mr. GERVASE ELWES.

Valse de la Reine } from 'Four Characteristic Waltzes'
Valse Bohémienne } for Orchestra (Op. 22).

Air ... 'Spring had come' (from 'Hiawatha').

Miss ESTA D'ARGO.

Song ... ... 'Thou art risen, my beloved.'

MR. ROBERT RADFORD.

Bamboula (Rhapsodic Dance), for orchestra.

The audience was a highly representative one. It included many choral conductors from both London and the provinces, and royalty was present in the person of H.R.H. Princess Louise, who was accompanied by H.S.H. Princess Louise of Battenberg and the Duke of Argyll.

The programme was selected simply to exhibit the composer at his best and in all his diverse moods. The occasion does not call for criticism of the proceedings, but it must be recorded that the performance, under Sir Frederick Bridge, of the two parts of 'Hiawatha' was smooth and agreeable, notwithstanding the mixed character of the resources employed. The always touching appeal of 'The death of Minnehaha' derived additional pathos from its inevitable association with the late composer. The Ballade in A minor, conducted by Sir Charles Stanford, was one of the successes of the evening, and the Waltzes were charmingly played under the skilful conducting of Mr. Landon Ronald. The songs had been admirably scored for the orchestra by M. Adolf Schmid, who was closely associated with Coleridge-Taylor in connection with incidental music used at His Majesty's Theatre. During the interval the widow and the two children of the composer were received by Her Royal Highness in her box. The gross receipts were over £1,200; but the amount of the net proceeds has not transpired.

The success of the event was very largely due to the labours of Col. H. Walters, V.D., and Mr. Julien Henry.

BRISTOL MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

The thirteenth Musical Festival which, in the ordinary course, would have been held last year, was postponed owing to the Coronation, and took place on four days in October this year, commencing on the 23rd. Musically it proved a great success, and there was a special feature in the performance of the four works comprised in Wagner's 'Nibelungen Ring' for the first time on the concert-platform, which drew particular attention to the Festival from different parts of the country, and in consequence of which numbers of enthusiasts came from other towns.

On each day of the Festival, there was a concert on the usual lines. The choir of 450 voices, under the careful direction of Mr. George Riseley, had thoroughly rehearsed productions which, although not new, had in the case of one—Elgar's 'Caractacus'—not before been heard in Bristol.

Upon the opening day 'Elijah' was given, with Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Dalton Baker as chief soloists. The performance was one of all-round excellence, the effectiveness of the choral vocalisation exciting much admiration.

Variety characterized the evening concert given on the same day. A pleasing commencement with Percy Pitt's 'English Rhapsody' for orchestra, skilfully conducted by the composer, was followed by Chopin's Concerto in F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, with M. Paderewski at the solo instrument. The remainder of the concert was taken up with a performance of 'Caractacus,' in which the soloists were Mr. Charles Knowles, in the title-rôle, Mr. Lloyd Chandos (Orbin), Miss Mabel Manson (Eigen), Mr. Robert Radford (the Archdruid and a Bard), and Mr. Percy Heming (Claudius).

At the evening concert, after 'Siegfried,' Herr Fritz Kreisler played Beethoven's Concerto with the utmost finish, and received at the end an elaborate presentation. 'Samson and Delilah' was then performed, the music of Saint-Saëns exercising its customary charm. The part of Delilah was taken by Miss Phyllis Lett; that of Samson, by Mr. Morgan Kingston; that of Abimelech, by Mr. Robert Radford; that of the High Priest of Dagon, by Mr. Charles Knowles. Minor characters of Philistines, &c., were apportioned to Messrs. Lionel E. Venn, Arthur E. Gough, and Percy Heming.

The Festival was brought to a termination on the evening of Saturday, October 26, with a popular concert, including among other features Sinigaglia's 'Piemonte' Suite, Schubert's 'Unfinished Symphony,' and Tchaikovsky's Overture '1812.'

On the Monday following the choir were entertained at the Drill Hall, in Queen's Road, by the Lord Mayor (Sir F. W. Wills). Mr. Riseley was presented by members of the choral body with a handsome writing-table. The band of the local battalion of the Gloucester Regiment played, and Miss Mabel Manson sang.

THE 'RING' PERFORMANCES.

Whatever may be the financial aspect of the arrangement, there can be no question whatever that good service was done by arranging a performance of the whole of Wagner's 'Nibelungen Ring.' In the face of the approval with which the performance of 'Die Walküre' was received four years ago, the interest and enthusiasm aroused, and the obvious success of the plan, it was a natural sequence that the whole of the trilogy should be given on the next occasion. It was unquestionably a feature of the Festival. It ought to have attracted Bristolians in their thousands. One would have thought that a work of this kind would have been of absorbing interest to the musical. But instead of crowded houses, the attendance was very indifferent. It was obvious, however, that those who had taken their courage in both hands and decided to face the awful ordeal of listening to the whole of the 'Ring,' were delighted with the experience. Certainly there was much enthusiasm at the close of each of the performances. There was every justification for it. Mr. Riseley provided a thoroughly sound interpretation. As far as his share of it went—and that was the direction of the orchestra—he succeeded in securing a very fine reading of the score. There was masterly attention to the representation of the motives, there was sustained homogeneity in the tone, and, moreover, there was perfect respect for the voices of the singers—not too often shown in Wagner performances. It is indeed a question whether the orchestral side of the work has ever been better given in this country. Thanks to the co-operation of the orchestra, most of whose members belonged to the London Symphony organization—the body that Herr Nikisch on one occasion described as being made up of artists—the tone was never blatant nor obtrusive. There was always a wonderful background of sound, probably just the very thing Wagner intended, although with the German instrumentalists it was necessary to put them twenty feet underground to secure the same effect. Mr. Riseley got it on the level. It was an extraordinary achievement, on which he and his forces are to be congratulated. It provided the true relation between orchestra and voices. Never once was the vocal tone overwhelmed by the orchestra.

For the representation of the characters Mr. Riseley took no risks. He wisely secured the services of those English singers who had taken part in the now historic performances of the work at the Royal Opera, and to these he added certain of the foreign artists who shared in that and subsequent triumphs. Where circumstances forbade the engagement of the same artists for the same parts he made a choice of his own, and was in every way justified. As an example, his selection of Miss Marion Beeley for the part of Fricka in 'Das Rheingold' was excellent. There was a fine cast for this section. Mr. Clarence Whitehill was the Wotan, sonorous and impressive, a little shy in finding himself with the use of both eyes, and inclined to keep both of them on the score, but nevertheless invariably gratifying. Mr. Frederic Austin, on the other hand, was the most animated of Alberichs, and not only sang superbly, but also indulged in hints of the stage that made it impossible to say that the performance was given without action. Herr Bechstein, curiously restrained by the conventional garb proper to the evening concert, gave all effect to the part of Mime. Miss Alice Prowse sang the music of Freia, and Miss Gertrude Winchester that of Erda, with very notable volume. The Rhine maidens,—Miss Lilian Coomber, Miss Alice Prowse, and Miss Marion Beeley—alone seemed a little out of their element. But Mr. Radford and Mr. Arthur Winckworth made an uncommonly good pair of Giants. The performance of 'Die Walküre' was even better. Miss Agnes Nicholls, who has been singing the part of Sieglinde in all parts of the Empire since she sang it at Covent Garden, made it perfectly clear that she has developed—on the concert-platform, at least—into a great operatic artist. Mr. Morgan Kingston did nothing so well as Siegmund, and there was a stirring performance of the long duet in the first Act. Miss Perceval Allen was once again a most gratifying Brünnhilde. Mr. Robert Radford, though not clad in furs, was as sinister as ever as Hunding, and Wotan's young ladies did their work well. With the assistance of Herr Cornelius and Herr Bechstein, a remarkably fine performance of 'Siegfried' was given. Herr Cornelius indulged in gesture of an illustrative kind in blowing his horn outside Fafner's cave, but the real effect came from his magnificent delivery of the Forging songs. Mime contented himself with gesticulating vocally, and the audience, at first puzzled by his quaint vocal mannerisms, very soon realised their import. The 'Awakening of Brünnhilde' was given in a highly romantic manner, for Miss Agnes Nicholls has rarely sung so well. The demonstration at the close was a spontaneous tribute. Mr. Austin (Alberich), Miss Phyllis Lett (Erda), Miss Alice Prowse (Waldvogel), and Mr. Clarence Whitehill (Wanderer), all contributed to enhance the value of the performance, and Mr. Arthur Winckworth as Fafner, with a megaphone, was uncommonly vocal from his lair in the organ-loft. The high level of the 'Siegfried' performance was well maintained in 'Götterdämmerung.' In this Herr Cornelius was the Siegfried, Miss Perceval Allen an untiring Brünnhilde, and Mr. Radford, Hagen. Miss Marion Beeley distinguished herself by her interpretation of the part of Waltraute. The orchestral playing was as good as ever, and Mr. Riseley maintained his enthusiasm, doubtless stimulated by the presentation, half-way, of a laurel wreath of enormous size,—though by no means so large as he deserved.

The friends of Miss Bertha Murray, who has been a successful teacher of school violin classes, will be pleased to know that the Testimonial Fund which was raised as a token of sympathy and regard in connection with her recent severe illness has amounted to £75, and that this sum was presented to Miss Murray by the chairman of the committee and treasurer of the fund, the Rev. Dr. Scott Lidgett, on October 25. The committee included Dr. C. W. Kimmins, the Mayor of Bermondsey (Councillor H. F. Morriss), and Dr. John E. Borland (hon. sec.), also a large number of representatives of L.C.C. and other schools, of the National Union of School Orchestras, and of the Bermondsey Settlement.

THE ANCIENT DANCE FORMS.

On November 5, Mr. Jeffrey Pulver lectured at the Musical Association on 'The Ancient Dance Forms,' selecting for treatment those which constituted the Suite—up to, but excluding, the Gigue. The first form of the Suite was a slow dance followed by a quick one, and it was thus that the Pavane and the Gaillarde were used to replace more primitive forms of dances, the Allemande and the Courante being added to build up the Suite of the 17th century, while later the Sarabande was also attached. The Basse-danse and the Branle were worthy of notice, because from them many of the later forms were derived. The former was written in both duple and triple measures, and led to the Pavane and the Gaillarde. The Branle, or danced Rondo, was probably identical with the German Reigen.

The Pavane was of Italian origin, its name being derived from Paduana or Padovana. It was a solemn and stately dance which enjoyed immense popularity in France, Italy, Spain, and England; one form of the Italian Canzone was suggested by it, and the largo of the French overture of 1700 owed its origin to it. The Pavane was invariably followed by the Gaillarde, the joyousness of which provided the desired contrast of style. The two enjoyed equal and contemporaneous popularity, and when about 1650 the one disappeared the other vanished also, their places being taken by the Sarabande and the Gigue. Shakespeare makes many references to the 'Galliard.'

About the Allemande there has been much misunderstanding, owing to the fact that there were two forms, one in duple and the other in triple time. The former was probably derived from the Reigen; the latter was and is a national dance in parts of Germany. At the commencement of the 17th century the Allemande was actually danced, and when so used was by no means so ornate as it was in the Allemande of Bach and other Suite-builders. When it was used as the opening movement of the Suite it lost much of its dance rhythm and became gently flowing. Mattheson says that 'Allemandes to dance and Allemandes to play are as different as heaven and earth.'

The Courante seems to have been suggested by the Gaillarde, and it assumed many shapes, speeds, and characteristics in the different countries and in the various periods during which it was used. It was necessary to distinguish between the French Courante and the Italian Corrente. The Corrente consisted of a succession of running notes, but the Courante was more like the Gaillarde with its dotted crotchet, quaver, crotchet rhythm. Bach, Mattheson, and Couperin—to mention only three—used both forms and adhered to the distinguishing titles. In time Courantes were evolved that were as unlike the original dance as could well be imagined. The Courante in its two forms and various speeds may be regarded as forming the link between the early Gaillarde and the later Canaries and Gigues on the one hand, and led to the Minuet—some say to the Waltz also—on the other.

The Sarabande was of Oriental origin. Modified in Spain it was still further changed in France, where it became very popular. From being of a sensuous character it was developed into a dance full of nobility and dignity. In the middle of the 17th century we find it admitted into the Suite, where it took its place between the Courante and the Gigue, and was made the vehicle for the display of polyphonic skill, reaching in the hands of the Germans great and important artistic heights. When the dance came to England it was quickly relieved of its solemn characteristics, and became a sort of country dance. Charles II. was particularly fond of the Sarabande, and it was consequently much used at his court.

We are pleased to note that Mr. Beecham's zeal for opera-giving in London, to which we owe many unique sensations, has returned, and that he will give a six weeks' season of opera and Russian ballet at Covent Garden, commencing on January 27. The list of operas to be mounted includes 'Salome,' 'Elektra,' 'Der Rosenkavalier,' 'Tristan und Isolde,' and 'Die Meistersinger.' The Russian Dancers will introduce four ballets new to England—'Petrovschka' (Stravinsky), 'Dieu Bleu' (Reynaldo Hahn), 'The Mask of the Red Death' (Tcherepnin), and 'L'après-midi d'un Faune' (Debussy), as arranged by M. Nijinski. The orchestra will of course be Mr. Beecham's own.

THE LATE WILLIAM KUHE. BORN DEC. 10, 1823, DIED OCT. 8, 1912.
(An Obituary notice appeared in our November issue, p. 722.)

BRIGHTON MUNICIPAL FESTIVAL.

There is a long record of musical Festivals at Brighton. It is well-nigh a century since the first of them was held. The most consistent, as well as the most enduring, effort in this direction was that carried out by the late William Kuhe. For thirteen years he sought to make a Brighton Musical Festival. The result was invariably a loss, even though there was some artistic gain. It is possible that the amateur tenor would never have been put in possession of his favourite ballad, 'I'll sing thee songs of Araby,' but for the Brighton Festival: for that very graceful and characteristic number belongs to a cantata, 'Lalla Rookh,' composed by Frederick Clay, and produced by Mr. Kuhe, with Mr. Edward Lloyd as its first exponent, thirty-five years ago. Then there was a long interval, and the Brighton Festival was heard of no more until the Corporation took over the Aquarium and, proceeding to carry on the good musical tradition laid down by Ryloff, Mr. F. Corder, and others—but especially Mr. Corder, who used to treat the trippers to Beethoven and Schubert—gave prominence to music. Two Festivals were the outcome. These took place in 1909 and 1910, and resulted first in a profit and then in a loss. Then there was an outcry against the cost—a twopenny rate was considered too much for music—and an era of retrenchment set in. A fresh musical director was appointed, and the size of the band was reduced to a minimum. Undismayed by the smallness of his force the new director, Mr. H. Lyell-Tayler, set himself to make the best of his opportunities. His first step was to make friends with the Brighton people—a factor that had been overlooked—and his next was to make the public familiar with the best music. Evenings with Wagner, Tchaikovsky, Grieg, and others made way for greater plans, and after it had lapsed for a year the Festival was re-instituted, and took place on November 13, 14, 15 and 16 last. The scheme provided six concerts in all, two being given on the last day. The Festival chorus, recruited largely from the old-established Sacred Harmonic Society, was re-constituted into the Municipal chorus, an excellent body of 350 voices; the Municipal Orchestra was augmented, and an executive force of 450 faced an interested public. Thus was history made, for herein was found a purely local force as the nucleus of the Festival. As soloists local artists were engaged as far as possible, and local musicians of distinction were invited to take a share in the proceedings. Business methods were adopted from the beginning. A certain sum (£1,000) was allocated to the purposes of the Festival, and was not exceeded. The receipts reached £1,200, and the profit was £250 more than on any previous occasion.

The object of the undertaking was frankly to provide an attraction at this popular resort. It is a gratifying thought that a musical Festival should be offered as an attraction. This fact—and the profit realised—show a healthy state of musical appreciation. There can be no doubt that the strong local character of the undertaking was of the greatest service in bringing about this notable result. Then the programme was well chosen, being designed on the principle of giving the public what it wanted. Thus, what amounted to an Elgar concert under the direction of the composer himself, and including his very latest work, 'The Music Makers,' was a wise move. It proved highly popular, and did what the other concerts rather failed to do, namely, induced music-lovers to make a special visit from London.

Although the audience for Saint-Saëns's 'Samson and Delilah,' which opened the Festival, might have been larger, the representation itself was excellent. The soloists who shared in it were Miss Alice Lakin, Mr. Morgan Kingston, Mr. Thorpe Bates, and Mr. George Baker.

At the second concert the Festival reached a very high level. There was a large audience, attracted no doubt by the double opportunity of hearing Sir Edward Elgar's new work 'The Music Makers' and of making its acquaintance under the direction of the composer. This, Sir Edward's most recent effort, was heard for the second time on this occasion. The means of its presentation differed very considerably from those of the initial performance at Birmingham, but it is nevertheless a tribute to the grateful character of the music that it proved equally effective. It must be accounted one of the most successful of his shorter works. The references to his own writings contained in it are singularly apt; the arrangement of the 'Nimrod' theme—to cite one example only—is particularly happy, since the vocal medium is so well suited to those beautiful phrases. The choir responded well to the composer's direction, and the performance was a striking proof of the ability of the work to make its appeal. Later Sir Edward directed his 'Enigma' Variations, and also the two recently-orchestrated songs, 'The torch' and 'The river.' These were given with Miss Muriel Foster as soloist, a service she also fulfilled in 'The Music Makers,' and in both cases with a degree of success that was indicated by the spontaneous demand for the repetition of the second of the songs. Other features in the scheme were a well-written 'Patriotic song' composed by Dr. Alfred King, the esteemed Brighton musician, who directed the performance in person; a delicate and appreciative performance of the second Pianoforte concerto of Saint-Saëns, by Mr. Max Darewski, who has thrown off the garb of the prodigy in favour of that of the virtuoso; and a highly-spirited representation under Mr. Lyell-Tayler's perceptive guidance of the 'Till Eulenspiegel' tone-poem of Richard Strauss, which was heard for the first time at Brighton. The following evening was given up to a performance of the 'Faust' of Berlioz. This was the choir's opportunity. They took full advantage of it, and sang well on the whole. The female voices were again the better. They were certainly the larger in point of numbers. The men were less satisfactory, but their appreciation of rhythm was very keen, although sometimes there was rhythm and less tone. This point, like that of the attack, release, and discipline generally, revealed well-directed preparatory work in connection with which the name of Mr. G. H. Witcomb, the deputy chorus-master, must be mentioned as well as that of Mr. Lyell-Tayler. But the finer points, such as are heard from choirs well drilled in competition work, were wanting. In this connection it is satisfactory to know that next year the Competitive Movement is to be instituted in association with these meetings. Under existing conditions, the Municipal Chorus is entitled to all praise, although want of resource within itself produced some weak moments in Berlioz's curiously modern choral writing. The orchestral portions, better known than any other parts of the work, were admirably played. The soloists were Miss Jennie Taggart, Mr. Frank Mullings, Mr. Thorpe Bates, and Mr. W. Lauder.

A Wagner programme for the last evening but one, constituted a popular feature, more especially as it was directed by Sir Henry Wood in most helpful fashion. He showed how good was the work done with the Municipal Orchestra by his former lieutenant. The most popular Wagner numbers were chosen, and those that were vocal were well sung by Miss Carrie Tubb and Mr. Herbert Heyner. The choir was silent—rather a pity, for if there is anything Wagnerian the general public loves, it is the Choral March from 'Tannhäuser.' As a contrast Mr. Harold Ketèlbey, the leader of the orchestra, played the Bach Chaconne in uncommonly good style, and was accorded an ovation. At the only day concert there were several works new to Brighton. Two of these were actual novelties: one, a 'Mélodie pathétique,' by Miss Marie Horne, was a tuneful production, somewhat tentatively scored; and the other, two orchestral pieces by Dr. W. H. Speer, entitled 'Infancy' and 'Childhood,' being part of a suite that has developed no further than these stages—but they showed all the sweetness and light of a somewhat ingenuous youth.

A first hearing was given to the new and highly-effective version of Mr. Edward German's 'March Rhapsody,' under the direction of the composer, who was warmly welcomed; as was Sir Alexander Mackenzie, who conducted his 'Invocation' and 'Humoresque' from 'Under the Clock' from his 'London day by day' Suite, which was as much appreciated at London-by-the-Sea as in the Metropolis itself. Among the choral numbers was the late Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' which was given its first but clearly by no means last hearing at Brighton. It was received with all the approval its graceful and fanciful writing invariably excites. The soloists were Miss Mary Leighton, Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. Wilbur Reed, and Mr. Julien Henry. Mr. Lyell-Tayler conducted. The choir sang Gounod's 'Gallia,' under Mr. Robert Taylor's direction, the solo part being sung by Miss Maud Barlow. For the performance of 'Carmen' at night the services of Miss Maude Santley and Signor Cellini were secured. Miss Mary Leighton, Miss Ella Webb, Mr. Julien Henry, Mr. William Chester, and Mr. Harry Taylor gave effective help in a performance that astonished and delighted both by its spirit and its pace. This, conducted by Mr. Lyell-Tayler, brought the Festival to a stirring close.

'ATALANTA IN CALYDON'

(GRANVILLE BANTOCK).

PERFORMANCES IN MANCHESTER AND LIVERPOOL.

This amazing work is a setting of four of the odes of Swinburne's celebrated poem of the same name. It is in four separate movements, and entitled 'A Choral Symphony,' and is written for groups of variously constituted choirs, divided into twenty parts. It is wholly unaccompanied, and occupies about thirty-five minutes in performance. It was first produced by the Hallé Choir at Manchester on January 25, under the direction of the composer. In our March number (pp. 165-6) we printed an article on the work written by Mr. Ernest Newman, to which we must refer readers who desire to learn more about its exceptional character. An account of the Manchester performance also appeared in the March number (p. 187). It was there stated that the Symphony was prepared under special difficulties, and although great honour must always attach to the Manchester Choir and their able trainer, Mr. R. H. Wilson, for the enterprise displayed, it had to be confessed that the performance was not satisfactory. But it served to create a deep impression, and led two well-known northern conductors,—Mr. Harry Evans (the Liverpool Welsh Choral Union) and Mr. W. S. Nesbitt (Manchester Opheus Male-voice Choir),—to resolve to unite their resources in order to give a more adequate interpretation, and in view of the peculiar demands of the work, they enlisted the willing assistance of the Gitana Ladies' Choir, Birkenhead, a first-rate organization conducted by Madame Maggie Evans. The combined choirs numbered four hundred singers. The task was a formidable one, because the music presented unprecedented difficulty, and demanded an extraordinary devotion of time and tenacity of purpose. But happily the result achieved fully justified the enormous trouble taken. The combination and their trainers can pride themselves on having accomplished a record—a virtuoso performance of the most difficult a cappella choral work ever written. The significance of this triumph of choral technique and interpretation is deep. A new path for choral effect is indicated. There is one qualm. Must the path always involve so much toil—one, as it were, viâ the North Pole, that must always be suffered? Cannot the way be made more comfortable? There must be some limits to human capacity in matters choral, and it would seem that these limits are now sufficiently ascertained.

The performance of the combined choirs at Manchester took place on October 30, under the baton of Mr. Nesbitt. A great audience assembled, and it is to their credit that they received the work with enthusiasm. Technically, the performance may not have been flawless, but it was grand in the main essentials and revealed generally the message of the music.

At Liverpool the performance was repeated on November 16 at the Philharmonic Hall, this time under Mr. Harry Evans, who by dint of further strenuous rehearsals was able to secure an even finer interpretation than that attained at Manchester. The attack gained in certainty, the climaxes were overpoweringly fine, and the tone-colour was exquisite and at times gorgeous. One felt that the ff of a fine choir was infinitely superior as music to that of an orchestra, which almost always involves some admixture of mere noise.

The Competition Festival Record

No. 53.

THE ROYAL NATIONAL EISTEDDFOD, ABERGAVENNY.—August, 1913.

The choice of tests for use at the Royal National and other Welsh Eisteddfodau has often occasioned controversy, but the discussion has never before reached the stage of acuteness that has developed in connection with the chief tests selected for next year's 'National' at Abergavenny, which we enumerate below:

Chief Choral Mixed-Voice Choirs

(150 to 200 voices).

Choruses in the first part of 'St. Paul.'

Second Choral Mixed-Voice Choirs (Open)

(From 60 to 80 voices).

'Theme Sublime,' from 'Jephtha' (Handel).
'Yr Ynys Wen' (Isle of Beauty) (J. H. Roberts).

Chief Male-Voice Choirs (60 to 80 voices).

'Fallen heroes' (Cyril Jenkins).
'Oleuni claer' ('Lead, kindly Light') (Protheroe).

Ladies' Choirs.

'The Pixies' (Coleridge-Taylor).
'Hail to thee' (Smart).

Mr. Granville Bantock was engaged as one of the adjudicators. Now he has resigned on the ground that the tests are not important enough for the occasion, and show a retrograde policy on the part of the committee. This trend of policy is not denied by the Eisteddfod secretary, Mr. R. H. Jackson, who defends it as a reasonable course in view of the whole circumstances of the case. The committee, not being disposed to go back on their choice, have had to decide to accept Mr. Bantock's resignation. The following are extracts from the correspondence that has passed.

On October 1, Mr. Bantock, after expressing his disappointment, says:

'I cannot consent to waste my time over the choruses in "St. Paul," and am astonished to find that no unaccompanied choral work has been selected for the chief competition. In these circumstances, my only course seems to be to offer your committee two alternatives, either the withdrawal of the pieces in question and the substitution of more suitable works or the acceptance of my resignation. If you would replace "St. Paul" by one of Bach's unaccompanied motets and commission one of your modern Welsh composers to write a special unaccompanied part-song, you would avoid the necessity of engaging an orchestra for the accompaniments—an unnecessary expenditure—and you would be maintaining the standard initiated by the enlightened musical committee at Wrexham. It is a suicidal policy to take any retrograde steps merely for the sake of attracting a capricious public. Your duty at these national gatherings should be to provide encouragement and a stimulus to musical art, and carefully to foster the national spirit of the country, which is aspiring to a higher level in efficiency, technique, and interpretation. This is obviously a critical moment, and your committee will deserve and receive no sympathy or encouragement if they turn backward. Let them remember Lot's wife!

'If the committee care to avail themselves of my further services I am willing to submit an alternative selection of pieces. It must, however, be clearly understood that I cannot adjudicate upon the music in the present programme.'

Mr. Jackson, in a long letter in which he questions whether 'the basis of the efforts that are being made to erect the edifice of progress is a reliable one,' declares that recent experiments made to raise the character of the tests have been failures, the number of choral entries having fallen off considerably. He goes on to say:

'In view of these facts the committee were bound to come to the conclusion that the fundamental conditions on which the present progressive standard has been erected are not sufficiently sound to ensure an uninterrupted upward movement, and that a natural reaction is desirable to discover a more correct basis upon which to erect the edifice of progress.'

He declares that Welsh emotionalism has not been intellectualised. He concludes by asking a depressing question, which, if it is justified, reveals how little has been accomplished by the Welsh nation—a nation of choralists—whose exploits in tone and expression have so often called forth the unstinted admiration of the best musicians. He says:

'In all seriousness, I should like to ask you how many choirs you consider there are at present in Wales qualified to effectively render one of Bach's unaccompanied motets in competition? A test of this kind would, I venture to say, spell financial disaster; and, after all, enterprise must be tempered by caution.'

Mr. Bantock in his reply says that until the Welsh make some effort to intellectualise their emotionalism their efforts will fail to interest any beyond their own border, and 'Wales as an art centre must cease to count. Art is emotion under the control of the intellect'; and he adds:

'You ask me how many Welsh choirs do I suppose capable of undertaking a Bach motet? To which I reply that there are very many Welsh choirs who have shown themselves quite capable of doing so, having already performed, and performed well, much modern music which is more difficult; that the supposed difficulty of the Bach motets is really the dread of the unknown, for in reality the technique of modern choral music is far more exacting than Bach's; and that in any case I only suggest a Bach motet for the highest class, i.e., for prize-winners.'

For our part we confess that the sight of the Abergavenny syllabus gave us a depressing shock. It recalled the experience of twenty or more years ago, and seemed to be a deliberate retreat from the progress that has been shown in National syllabuses in recent years. It is lamentable that gifted Wales should voluntarily cut itself away from the stream of progress that has distinguished the competition movement in England. We cannot help hoping, and believing, that a reaction from this reaction will come from within the Principality.

KEIGHLEY (THE 'SUMMERSCALES' COMPETITIONS).—October 19 and 26.

This year the annual competitive festival organized to perpetuate the memory of Mr. W. H. Summerscales 'came of age' amid gratifying conditions. The new features were a class for action-songs, a contest of Band of Hope and Sunday School choirs, and the first contest for a challenge shield presented by Mrs. J. B. Summerscales for competition in the mixed-voice choral class.

In this division the tests were Leslie's 'Thine eyes so bright' and Davidson's 'Sweet summer night.' The following choirs competed, with the result indicated:

1st. Armley Choral Society (Mr. H. H. Pickard).
Eccleshill Choir, Bradford (Mr. J. T. Wilcock).
3rd. Keighley Vocal Union (Mr. W. H. Whitaker).
Crosland Moor Wesleyan (Mr. R. H. Dyson).
2nd. Bradford Vocal Union (Mr. J. Barker).

Among the male-voice choirs Holme Valley (Mr. I. Silverwood) showed a decided superiority in 'The sturdy rock' by Walford Davies and 'Peace' by Dr. Bridge. Armley were first among female-voice choirs, and Lower Wortley Boys C.S. (Mr. Tom Morton) among school choirs. In classes where the entries were restricted by conditions the prizes were won by Settle Choral Society (Mr. F. Lord) and Heaton Parish Church Prize (Male) Choir (Mr. C. Milne Rooke). West End S.S. (Miss C. Wadsworth) were best among Sunday Schools, and Walverden C.S., Nelson, won the action-song prize with 'O no, John!' There were also some solo classes which were well supported.

The adjudicators were Mr. T. Tertius Noble and Mr. Charles Risegari.

NOTTINGHAM.—October 26.

This is a well-managed event, and it was surprising that so much was accomplished in one day. The following six adjudicators were working individually in separate halls for the greater part of the day: Dr. McNaught, Mr. Harry Evans, Mr. Allen Gill, Mr. Arthur Barlow, Mr. Frederick Wyatt, and Miss Cantelo. The committee is a strong one, presided over by Mr. E. Wynne Humphrey, and the secretarial work is all unostentatiously carried out by Mr. F. Purdy and Mr. A. K. Purdy. Another tower of strength to the Festival is Mr. Charles E. Riley, whose late father, Mr. William Riley, established it in 1902. The Girls' Solo-singing Section revealed many beautiful voices and much attractiveness of style, and the Boys' Section was also successful in bringing forth talent. Pianoforte playing is evidently well studied in the district, if we may judge by the players that came forward. Adult solo-singers were numerous, no fewer than 128 having entered. Some very charming singing of exceptionally pretty tests (two-part song, 'Lullaby,' by Brahms, and a unison song, 'Sparrows in a tree,' by Colin Taylor) by the school classes was a feature. Fifteen male-voice choirs appeared to sing MacDowell's 'Love and Time,' and his 'War song.' In the female-voice trio class, Mackenzie's 'Distant bells' was performed with moving sincere expression and beautiful tone by the winning choir from Manfield, Northampton, under Mr. W. F. Marshman. Twelve mixed-voice choirs competed in one section, and four others in the chief challenge shield class. The chief awards were as follows:

Solo (girls under 15).—'Verdant meadows' (Handel). 1st. Winifred Adams, Ilkeston.

Solo (boys under 15).—'Where'er you walk' ('Semele') (Handel). 1st. Edgar Turner, Nottingham.

Violin (under 18).—Corelli's Sonata in E minor. 1st. Leslie Chettle, Nottingham.

Pianoforte (under 14).—Test, Mozart's Sonata in C major (first movement). 1st. Grace Truswell, Nottingham.

Pianoforte (under 21).—Valse, Chopin, Op. 34, No. 1. 1st. Edith H. Wood, Whitnash.

Pianoforte accompanying and sight accompanying test.—1st. Bert L. Andrews, Cleethorpes.

Soprano.—Jewel song from 'Faust.' 1st. Miss J. Winchester, Rubery.

Contralto.—'The Lord is my light' (Frances Allitsen). 1st. Miss L. Callis, Belgrave.

Tenor.—'Onaway, awake, beloved!' (Coleridge-Taylor). 1st. Mr. L. W. Wildgoose, Matlock.

Baritone.—Toreador song from 'Carmen.' 1st. Mr. P. Pugh, Leamington.

Bass.—'Song of Hybrias, the Cretan' (Elliott). 1st. Mr. B. Matthews, Beeston.

Organ.—Fantasia sonata in A flat, and sight-reading. 1st. G. H. Taylor, Leicester.

Children's choirs. — Brahms's 'Lullaby' and Colin Taylor's 'Sparrows in a tree.' 1st. Wilford Endowed School (Mr. C. S. Harris); 2nd. Forster Street School, Nottingham (Miss E. T. Nixon); 3rd. Newgate Council School, Mansfield (Mr. W. R. Crow).

Girls' choirs (G.F.S.).—'Oh, the summer' (Coleridge-Taylor). 1st. Arnold (Miss Burgis); 2nd. Skegby (Rev. L. J. Stamper).

Male-voice choirs.—'Love and time' and 'War song' (MacDowell). 1st. Coventry Musical Club (Mr. J. Chapman); 2nd. Church Gresley P.M. 'A' (Mr. G. Walton).

Female-voice choirs. — 'Distant Bells' (Mackenzie). 1st. Manfield Choir, Northampton (Mr. W. F. Marshman); 2nd. Garibaldi, Grimsby (Mr. P. Wilson); 3rd. William Turner's Girls' Prize Choir, Nottingham.

Mixed-voice choirs (not exceeding 30 voices).—'Battle of the Baltic' (Lloyd) and 'Yea, though I walk' (Sullivan). 1st. Manfield Choir, Northampton; 2nd. Annesley Woodhouse Co-op. (Mr. G. H. Attwood).

Grand Challenge Shield contest (choirs of not more than 60 voices).—Tests, 'The Tempest' (Cornelius), 'Come, pretty wag' (Parry), and 'Evening scene' (Elgar). 1st. Wm. Woolley Choral Society, Nottingham (Mr. W. M. Woolley); 2nd, Garibaldi Choral Society, Grimsby; 3rd. Philharmonic Society, Nottingham (Mr. W. Turner).

At the evening concert the most attractive feature was the singing of the combined choirs under the skilful conducting of Mr. Charles Riley.

JERSEY.—October 28-31.

The musical side of the fifth Jersey Eisteddfod included several contests for school choirs in which the first-prizes were won by the National Girls' School Junior Class (Miss L. Daniel), St. Ouest's Parochial School (Mr. J. G. Allen), Brighton Road School Infants, and—in the chief class—St. Luke's Mixed School (Mr. T. C. Stent). In an Inter-Decanal Choir Competition the test was Pinsuti's 'Eldorado,' of which the Eastern Town Choir (Mr. W. B. Morris) gave the best out of four performances. There were numerous solo, duet, and quartet competitions. The adjudicators were Miss Lily Fairney and Mr. Robert Taylor.

LEIGH.—November 2.

The Eisteddfod held here under Welsh Presbyterian auspices was exceptionally successful this year. The chief prizes were won by Longsight Wesleyan Juvenile Choir (Miss E. Fletcher), Runcorn Highfield Male Choir (Mr. S. Hassel), Chowbent Chapel Choir (Mr. T. Martin), and Atherton Baptist Choral Society (Mr. G. Meadows). The adjudicators were Mr. Emlyn Davies and Mr. D. D. Parry.

BARROW-IN-FURNESS.—November 7, 8, 9.

This Festival, now in its fourteenth year, continues to flourish. There were thirty-two sections represented in the programme, and the entries were numerous, sometimes embarrassingly so. There was some good pianoforte playing. The unison violin playing was not satisfactory, but Miss Richard, of Preston, showed excellent talent in the open class. Nine contraltos essayed Ernest Austin's original and beautiful song, 'Life,' which was written to Mrs. Barbauld's touching words. Miss Foulds, of Earby, was first. In the children's vocal solo sections the most remarkable class was that for girls under sixteen, in which the test-piece was the very expressive and naïve song, 'At night,' by Randegger. Some of the performances were wonderfully moving. Three girls—Doris Young (Millom), Ethel Benson (Barrow), and Annie Sutherland (Birkenhead)—tied for first place. School choirs competed in singing Percy Fletcher's cantata, 'The walrus and the carpenter.' The Millom St. George's Girls' (Mr. H. G. Cooke) gained one more mark than Barrow; St. James's Girls' (Mrs. G. Ashburner) were second. On the evening of the children's day, the combined choirs gave a delightful performance of the cantata.

On the third day all the classes were open, and there were heavy entries. Sixty tenors, baritones, and basses competed in the solo classes. There were some exceptionally fine choral performances during the afternoon and evening. The celebrated Barrow Choir, under Mrs. Bourne, took part, and won two first-prizes, but in the men's choir section they were beaten by one mark by Mr. Grosse's Lancaster Choir. A feature in the chief mixed-voice class was the advance to the front made by Mr. Ernest E. Unsworth's Carnforth Choral Society. Here again only one mark separated them from the first place, which was taken by the Barrow Choir.

The adjudicators were Dr. W. G. McNaught and Mr. Arthur Wilson, of Stockton.

The following is a summary of the chief awards of the open day:

(Maximum, 80 marks.)

Tenor Solo.—'Ah, moon of my delight' (Liza Lehmann), 23 entries. 1st, Mr. Victor J. Higman, Barrow, 72; 2nd, Mr. Albert A. Wood, Workington, 70.

Baritone Solo.—'Roadways' (Balfour Gardiner), 23 entries. 1st, Mr. Jack Woodruff, Millom, 73; 2nd, Mr. Virgil Crowther, Earby, 72.

Bass Solo.—'Young Dietrich' (Henschel), 16 entries. 1st, Mr. W. J. Dobie, Dumfries, 74; 2nd, Mr. Stanley Cross, Barrow, 73.

Female-voice Choir Competition.—'Encinctured with a twine of leaves' (Coleridge-Taylor), 6 entries. 1st, Blackpool Orpheus (Mr. Clifford Higgin, conductor), 71; 2nd, Carnforth Choral Society (Mr. Ernest E. Unsworth), 70.

Male-voice Choirs.—'Sorrow's tears' (Cornelius) and 'Crusaders' (MacDowell), 4 entries. 1st, Lancaster (Mr. R. T. Grosse), 71 and 73, total, 144; 2nd, Barrow (Mrs. T. Bourne), 68 and 75, 143.

Madrigal.—'Ye that do live in pleasures plenty' (Wilbye), 7 entries. 1st, Barrow Madrigal Society (conducted by Mrs. T. Bourne), 73; 2nd, Carnforth Choral Society (Mr. Ernest E. Unsworth), 71.

Mixed-voice Choirs Challenge Shield Competition.—'O'er Jordan's banks' (Max Bruch) and 'Come o'er the sea' (Havergal Brian), 6 entries. 1st and Challenge Shield, Barrow Madrigal Society (Mrs. Bourne), 76 and 73, 149; 2nd, Carnforth Choral Society (Mr. Ernest E. Unsworth), 75 and 73, 148.

SALFORD.—November 16.

With commendable enterprise the Wesleyan Choir of the colliery village of Irlams o' th' Height organized a Competitive Festival, the only regrettable feature at which was the small number of entries in the Choral Classes.

The following were the principal classes and prize-winners, together with the test-pieces:

Soprano Solo.

Tests: 'Solveigj's song' (Grieg).
'My birthday' (Cowen).
Muriel A. Bradburn, Stretford.

Contralto Solo.

Test: 'Beloved, it is morn' (Aylward).
Lizzie Bates, Seedley.

Tenor Solo.

Test: 'Love is mine' (Gartner).
Edward P. Jones, Old Trafford.

Mixed-Voice Choirs.

Test: 'Moonlight' (Eaton Faning).

		Marks.
	Hyde Road Choral Society, West Gorton (Mr. F. Annable)	82
1st.	Salford Vocal Society (Mr. F. W. Blacow) ...	90

Male-Voice Choirs.

1st.	Salford Vocal Society (Mr. F. W. Blacow) ...	84
	Cambria Male-Voice, Eccles (Mr. Llewellyn Hughes)	78

The adjudicators were Mr. W. H. Cradock (Manchester Cathedral) and Mr. Luther Greenwood (conductor of the Colne Orpheus).

THE BLACKPOOL GLEE AND MADRIGAL SOCIETY.

A notable coming of age was celebrated at Blackpool on November 11, when the Blackpool Glee and Madrigal Society gave a concert to mark the twenty-first year of its existence. The retrospect printed in the programme recounts many splendid achievements. Mr. Herbert Whittaker was a pioneer of the new choral technique and insight of interpretation, and generally he has done noble service to the cause of choral music. The programme on this occasion brought forward many gems, by the performance of which the Choir has from time to time won its triumphs. We shall now look forward to the jubilee of the Choir, and meantime offer our heartiest good wishes to its members and conductor.

WEDNESBURY.—November 16.

The chief events in the course of the first Wednesbury and District Competitive Festival were contests for children's choirs and for church and chapel choirs. In the former, Fletcher's 'Song of the summer winds' was the test and, out of nine entries, Station Road Girls' School, Aston (Miss A. L. Toye) were first, and Dorset Road Girls' School, Darlaston (Miss M. Millner), were second. Among the church choirs Bilston Wesleyan (Mr. F. A. Bendall) won the first-prize, and Rushall Congregational (Mr. Tom Dean) the second for their singing of Woodward's anthem, 'The radiant morn,' and the hymn, 'Lead, kindly Light.' There were various solo classes for juvenile competitors, and an action-song class. Dr. Alfred J. Silver adjudicated.

QUEEN'S HALL, LONDON.—November 20.

The annual 'chair' Eisteddfod, held under the auspices of the C.M. Church, Falmouth Road, S.E., attracted an excellent choral entry. Of the five mixed-voice choirs that sang Jenkins's 'They that go down to the sea in ships,' the best was Folkestone Philharmonic Society (Mr. H. E. Fletcher); Essendine (Mr. W. Kendall) was second, and Maidstone Choral Union (Mr. F. Wilson Parish) third. Twelve choirs entered in the Male-Voice Class, the test for which was Paliard's 'The Hebrew captives.' The prizes were won as follows: 1st, Cardiff (Mr. Roderick Williams); 2nd, Pontypridd Maritime (Mr. F. Temple Evans); 3rd, Kenfig Hill (Mr. William Rees).

Prizes for solo-singing were won by Miss Lily Clatworthy (soprano, 28 entries), Miss Myrtle Jones (contralto, 27 entries), Mr. W. M. Griffith (tenor, 20 entries), and Mr. Nevin Jones (baritone, 41 entries).

The adjudicators were Mr. D. Jenkins and Dr. Caradog Roberts.

NEW COMPETITIONS.

Bolton.

At a meeting held in Bolton on November 5, it was decided to hold a Competitive Festival. At the time of going to Press we have not been informed as to the date.

Croydon.

A musical Competition Festival will be held here on March 10 and 15. The secretary's address is 'Beethoven House,' 28, George Street, Croydon.

BRISBANE.—March 22 and 24, 1913.

The test-pieces in the chief choral classes at this Eisteddfod are as follows: Mixed-voice choirs, 'The captivity in Babylon' and 'But then His flock forsook' from 'Zion' (Gade) and 'O wild west wind' (Elgar); Male-voice choirs, 'Walpurga' (Hegar) and 'The lost love' (D. Thomas); Female-voice choirs, 'Something brighter, purer far' (Smart); Madrigal class, 'Sweet nymphs that trip along' (Greaves) and 'Arise, awake' (Morley). There are in all thirty-six musical competitions.

MORECAMBE.—April 29 to May 3, 1913.

The full syllabus of this event can now be obtained from the secretary, Mr. W. C. Fawcett, West End Road, Morecambe. It contains many interesting features, and should attract a large number of entries. No fewer than eight adjudicators are announced.

A bazaar held a few months ago was very successful. It not only cleared off the debt incurred during the last few years, but left a handsome surplus.

STRATFORD AND EAST LONDON.

The Stratford (East London) syllabus for next Spring (1913) Festival just issued, gives a list of eighty-two classes, thirty of which are instrumental.

The number seems unusually large, but this is to some extent owing to what are elsewhere regarded as sub-divisions (a, b, c, &c.) being enumerated as separate classes. Stratford adopts the proper course, and saves confusion.

We read that 'quite a number of prizes have been won during the last year in other places by choirs that first earned their laurels at Stratford. In the North, the Midlands, at the Crystal Palace, in Paris, and many other places, people have found out that the "far, far East," as they have been heard to call it, "has far, far away the best singing."'

But no East London choirs besides the children's choir from the Farmer Road School have won prizes or even competed at the great Midland and Northern Festivals. Local patriotism is, however, a too precious virtue to deserve to be discouraged.

We are glad to note that the choral tests selected for the event show progress. Elgar's 'Evening scene' and Bantock's 'Music when soft voices die' are chosen for the chief open class. But the men's choir still seem 'far, far away' from, say, Bantock's 'Kubla Khan.'

The influence of this great Festival in the districts appealed to must be immense. The secretary is Mr. John Graham, 74, Park Hall Road, East Finchley, London, N.

A choral contest held at the Moot Hall, Colchester, on October 9, attracted four choirs—those of All Saints, St. Nicholas, and St. Giles representing the town, and that of Birch representing the neighbourhood. Under the direction of the Rev. Percy Luard, Birch were successful. The test-pieces were 'O Saviour of the world,' by Goss, and 'Almighty and everlasting God,' by Orlando Gibbons. Dr. Percy Buck adjudicated.

The William Woolley Choral Society gave a concert at South Street Schools, Ilkeston, on November 19, under the direction of Mr. William Woolley, who has led this organization to many competitive successes. The programme included compositions by Cornelius, Elgar, Parry, Pinsuti, Rogers, Buck, Wilbye, and Morley.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

ONE-HUNDRED-AND-FIRST SEASON.

A programme typical of the age was arranged by the Philharmonic Society for the first concert of its one-hundred-and-first season on November 7. Nothing but orchestral music was heard. Herr Mengelberg, who owes to this Society his introduction to England, was the conductor. The scheme comprised the third Symphony of Brahms and the Strauss tone-poem, 'Also sprach Zarathustra.' The latter was played at these concerts for the first time, and was the central attraction of the evening. Herr Mengelberg's reading was of remarkable clarity: nothing was left to the imagination. Every theme, principal or contributory, was made to stand out. The orchestra, a newly-constituted body led by Mr. John Saunders, obeyed the conductor's directions most loyally. A similar line was taken with respect to the Brahms Symphony. By way of tribute to the memory of the late Samuel Coleridge-Taylor, his Ballade in A minor for orchestra was very finely played. It was to be noted that the Society returned to the century-old practice of describing the parts of the programme as 'Acts'; but it was not announced at what time the Sedan-chairs (with taxi-meters) would be in attendance.

At the second concert, on November 21, the Society gave proof of its youthfulness by producing two new British works—by Dr. Walford Davies and Mr. Thomas Dunhill. Contrary to all expectation, the Society showed the utmost appreciation of the fact that since its institution a century ago a definite British School of creative music has come into existence. The two new examples proved to be very striking specimens of this British School which, thanks to Elgar, exists at the present day.

Dr. Walford Davies was represented by an orchestral suite, 'after Wordsworth,' which proved a very striking and original work. There are four movements, in which Sarabande and Gavotte are duly represented, but their terms are of to-day. The idiom is British to the core. No more typical effort has been made by Dr. Walford Davies since his 'Solemn Melody.' The music breathes our island air; its craftsmanship is erudite, personal, and remarkably effective. The Suite is one of those things we can show to our foreign friends with the same confidence that we put before them a 15th century madrigal. The composer conducted. The contribution of Mr. Thomas Dunhill was a setting of W. B. Yates's 'Wind among the reeds,' for tenor voice. It was of perfect individuality, fresh and characteristic. Mr. Gervase Elwes was the soloist, and the reception was most cordial. Sir Frederic Cowen was the conductor, and in addition to directing Strauss's 'Tod und Verklärung,' gave sympathetic support to Mr. Harold Bauer, who played the G major Pianoforte concerto of Beethoven with masterly complacency, due no doubt to the fact that before the night ended he was to be one of the honoured few who receive the Society's gold medal.

MR. G. H. CLUTSAM'S OPERA IN BERLIN.

The alarums and excursions which preceded the production of Mr. Clutsam's 'König Harlekin' at the Kurfürstenoper in Berlin, on November 8, should make the subject of an interesting chapter in operatic history; but discretion counsels silence, and in any case it is more pleasant to dwell on the eminently satisfactory result. The reception of the new work by the audience was extremely cordial, and those who have had opportunities of studying the manners and customs of the Berlin Press were agreeably surprised at the tone of the notices. It would be too much to say that the work was received with enthusiasm, but it is a great thing that the writers of the German capital should have treated an English musician as a person deserving respect and consideration, and not with that contemptuous condescension with which they generally greet music from beyond the frontier. It struck me as curious that one or two critics should have rather resented the fact that Mr. Clutsam is a critic. It is hard to see why it should have annoyed them. One would have thought that they would realise that the fact that one of the craft can compose an opera is honourable to it. Perhaps it is because the idea of the critic as the lion and the composer as the lamb, who is his natural victim, still prevails in some critica minds which were rather disturbed at being confronted with a combination of the two.

The libretto of 'König Harlekin' is founded on the play of the same name by Dr. Rudolf Lothar, the composer being mainly responsible for its final shape. The subject, briefly, is that Bohemund, a worthless Prince, has long been exiled from his home, and is therefore hardly known to any of his subjects. He returns home unexpectedly at the moment of his father's death, and has in his train a troupe of Italian mummers, including one Harlekin, who is so like him that he has often taken his place in his discreditable adventures. They admire Columbine, who is indifferent to both of them; and a scuffle ensues in which Harlekin kills the Prince and throws his body into the sea. Harlekin then assumes his place and rules well. Columbine, thinking Harlekin dead, discovers that she really loves him, and plots to destroy the Prince and escape. Harlekin reveals the truth to her in the course of a play which is enacted at the Court, and escapes. No one but the Prince's blind mother had discovered the deception, and the dead king's brother, Tancred, therefore finds it easy to announce that the king has been drowned, for it would be unwise, he argues, to let the people know that a harlequin could be a good king. The libretto has this merit, that the dramatic situations seem to be naturally evolved from the psychology of the characters. The middle act, which represents the crowning of the false king, and his recognition by the murdered Prince's mother, is, taken by itself, perhaps the best; but it does not fit well with the remainder.

Those who remember Mr. Clutsam's 'Summer Night,' which was performed at His Majesty's Theatre under the Beecham management, two years ago, will find in 'König Harlekin' an enormous advance in the sense of drama, and in the art of eliminating what is superfluous. The use of leitmotifs is much more significant, and the vocal music much stronger in dramatic expression. The pictorial and picturesque skill of the orchestration, however, remains the strongest feature of the score, and it was ungrudgingly admitted by the German critics, even by those who laid too much stress on the reminiscences, which in such a case are perhaps inevitable. The performance at the Kurfürsten-oper was dramatically good. Both Herr Merkel as Harlekin and Fräulein Salden as Columbine acted very well; but from the vocal point of view it is impossible to find much that is good to say of anybody concerned. The singing was far below English standards. The orchestra, under Cortolezis, who conducted the Denhof performances in England last spring, was very good. The mounting was artistic on the whole, and original; but most of the effects were spoiled by the adherence to the fallacious theory that constant darkness on the stage is impressive. The stage-manager seemed to forget that it is impossible for an actor to establish a hold on his public unless the play of his features is visible. In this case the opening scene was so dark that more than half the audience thought it was the Prince who had killed Harlekin, and consequently they were entirely bewildered by all that happened subsequently.

London Concerts.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

This Society opened its season with 'Elijah,' which as usual attracted a great audience at the Albert Hall. Sir Frederick Bridge conducted a performance that had all the virtues of straightforwardness and massiveness. The chief solo parts were taken by Miss Ruth Vincent, Madame Ada Crossley, Miss Florence Taylor, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Herbert Brown. Mr. H. L. Balfour assisted at the organ.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

On November 2, Brahms's third Symphony was played at Queen's Hall for the second time within a week. Sir Henry Wood and his Orchestra again showed the power of painting the lily that made for super-beautification of Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony at their previous concert. Both works stand the treatment well. Ravel's suite 'Ma mère l'Oye,' which gave such delight with its orchestral conjuring last season, and again at the 'Proms.' was repeated; a 'Brandenburg' Concerto was played; and Miss Marie Hall gave a refined interpretation of Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto.

The distinguishing feature of the concert given on November 16 was the re-appearance of Eugen d'Albert as pianist. He played Beethoven's 'Emperor' concerto with superb breadth. He is one of the few pianists who can interpret Beethoven from the plane of intellectual intimacy and speak as if with the composer's own mind. The Symphony was Schubert's C major, which is falling into disuse, but not into unpopularity. Max Reger's 'Lustspiel' Overture, heard for the first time in England, proved characteristically ingenious. Saint-Saëns's 'La Rouet d'Omphale' completed the programme.

The annual benefit concert to Mr. Robert Newman on November 18 presented no unusual features. The programme was entirely Wagner, Mr. Ben Davies was the vocalist, and the audience, we are glad to note, was large.

THE LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The ninth series of concerts given by this organization made a propitious start on October 28. Although the weather was very bad, the hall was crowded in every part. Yet there was not a single novelty in the programme—nothing composed after 1876! The attraction was the reputation of the Orchestra and the virtuoso conductor, Herr Fritz Steinbach, who on this occasion still further enhanced his reputation, if that was possible. Schubert's 'Unfinished' had a fascinating interpretation, the second movement being taken rather slower than usual and with a too free rubato treatment for some critics. Herr Adolf Busch gave a somewhat austere performance of Brahms's Violin concerto, but he showed that he has been trained in a sound school. Schumann's 'Genoveva' Overture was very finely played. The sensation of the concert was a great interpretation of the C minor Symphony of Brahms; the playing of the final movement was an unforgettable experience.

At the concert given on November 11, Herr Steinbach again conducted. Mozart's G minor Symphony was played with rare delicacy and vitality. Holbrooke's tone-poem 'The Raven' was an attractive feature of the programme. It exhibits the characteristic fancifulness and imagery of the composer at their best. A beautiful performance of Brahms's Rhapsody for alto and male-voice choir was given, Miss Muriel Foster singing the solo in her most artistic style. The chorus was supplied by the Manchester Orpheus Society (Mr. W. S. Nesbitt), and they sang with rare beauty of tone and artistic restraint. The whole performance was a perfectly balanced one and made a deep impression. An exciting interpretation of 'Till Eulenspiegel' concluded the concert, which was again well attended.

NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A well-considered and effectively carried-out interpretation of Elgar's first Symphony given by this proficient Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Landon Ronald, gave distinction to the concert on October 31, at Queen's Hall. It differed in some respects from the reading Mr. Ronald used to give, being on a smoother emotional level and more significant in detail. For instance, the brilliant and usually elusive wind-passages in the development of the first movement became more than usually clear and intelligible. The string playing was thoroughly Elgarian, and apart from much of the brass tone the performance left nothing wanting. Mr. Ronald introduced a new Suite he has arranged from Bizet's 'L'Arlésienne' music, the movements of which he has brought into good concert form with passages of his own construction based upon other movements. It made excellent hearing, and would be useful to amateur orchestras. Madame Julia Culp having unfortunately supplied orchestral parts of Beethoven's 'Clarchenlieder' in too high a key, was forced to confine her contributions to Lieder by Brahms and Schubert. These she sang in a way that surely left few to complain of the substitution. The concert came to an end with an admirable performance of Strauss's 'Don Juan.'

D

THE LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY: 'OMAR KHAYYÁM.'

The extraordinary enterprise and perseverance of this Society deserve special acknowledgment. For the second time in its history it has had the courage to present Granville Bantock's 'Omar Khayyám' complete. This event took place on October 30, at the Queen's Hall. As this monumental work takes over three hours to perform, the concert had to begin at the unusual hour of 7.30 p.m. The music presents much difficulty, not merely technical but owing to its peculiar idiom. Notwithstanding this, the performance was a remarkably smooth one, and the fine climaxes of the work were admirably realised. The sonority and certainty of attack of the choir seem to increase with experience. The soloists were Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Frederic Austin. It is no reflection on the two former artists to say that Mr. Austin sang with special distinction. The intensity of his conviction, the mood-penetration of his delivery, and his constant command of tone-colour magnetised attention. The London Symphony Orchestra co-operated, and in their hands the glowing orchestration received full justice. Mr. Arthur Fagge conducted with his usual ability.

One of the most attractive concerts of the season was given at Æolian Hall, on November 9, by the Chaplin Trio, in aid of the Shakespeare Memorial Fund. The outstanding feature was the performance on three harpsichords, with string quartet accompaniment, of Bach's Triple Concerto in D minor. Mrs. George Cornwallis-West, Miss Nellie Chaplin, and Mr. W. Wostenholme manipulated the harpsichords with notable effect. There was much other old music, and there were Old English dances of the kind with which Miss Chaplin has happily made us familiar.

Mr. Smallwood-Metcalfe's Choir gave one of their interesting concerts at Queen's Hall on November 5. A long programme included Wilbye's 'Sweet honey-sucking bees' and Chapuis's 'The two fiddlers,' a test-piece at the Paris Competition. Both were well sung.

The concert given by the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society at Queen's Hall, on November 6, under the direction of Mr. Arthur W. Payne, upheld the reputation of this progressive body. Sibelius's 'Karelia' Suite was the chief feature of an interesting programme. Madame Donalda and Mr. Ivor Foster were the soloists.

A concert of unusual character was given at Bechstein Hall, on November 13, by Mr. Claude Pollard (pianist) and Mr. Frank Arnold (violinist), both of whom were heard in concertos, accompanied by the London Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Oscar Eve. Mr. Arnold also introduced a new Phantasy for violin and orchestra by Mr. Montague Phillips, a work characteristic of the composer in its clearness of meaning and vivacity of interest. A Prelude and a Ballet Suite by Mr. Morton Stephen proved ingenious and musicianly.

The capacious new Wesleyan Central Hall at Westminster was the venue chosen by Mr. Arthur Cowen (conductor) and the Twickenham Philharmonic Society—assisted by the Thames Valley Orchestral Society and other local organizations—for their first appearance in Central London, on November 13. Expressive interpretations were given of each part of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' and the singing was marked by excellent tone-quality. The solo parts were taken by Miss Dorothy Cook-Smith, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Stewart Gardner.

The Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestra Society gave a surprisingly effective performance of part of Bantock's 'Omar Khayyám' on November 16, under Mr. Allen Gill's direction. The technical resources of the choir were sufficient to make good every harmonic complexity in the choral writing, and the orchestra were equal to the special endeavours required by the occasion. The soloists were Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Frederic Austin. Mr. G. D. Cunningham occupied his usual place at the organ.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The visit of two well-known Continental quartets—the 'St. Petersburg' and the 'Flonzaley' (Berlin)—has given a zest to a none too-inspiring concert season. Each party gave two concerts at Bechstein Hall.

The St. Petersburg Quartet were first heard, on October 29, in Glazounov's work in A, which they failed to make interesting, Debussy's in G minor, and Beethoven's in F (the first 'Rassoumoffsky' Quartet). As before, their playing appealed not so much by its purity or delicacy, or even accuracy, as by its vitality, eloquent tone, and unanimous strength of character. The modern orchestral mode of writing for the string quartet, exemplified frequently in the work of Glazounov, could hardly have had better exposition. At their second concert, on November 11, the St. Petersburg players introduced a Quartet in G minor, Op. 1, by S. Roudolph, a Russian composer. It displayed imagination and technical ability, but not in sufficient degree to justify a definite opinion as to the composer's position. Tanéïèw's Quartet in C major, a somewhat turgid work, gave scope for the St. Petersburg sonority. Lastly came a set of ten variations on a Russian folk-melody by ten Russian composers—Artiboucheff, Scriabine, Glazounov, Rimsky-Korsakov, Liadov, Wihtol, Blumenfeld, Ewald, Winkler, and Sokolov. The whole lasted about ten minutes, and the composers seemed under orders to avoid seriousness, for they did so with perfect agreement. Except for a tapering off towards the end in the value of the ideas, the work as a whole was well unified.

On October 29 the Flonzaley Quartet occupied Bechstein Hall in the evening, and played quartets by Mozart in D, Ravel in F, and a Sonata for two violins and violoncello by the 18th-century composer, Giuseppe Sanmartini. The Sonata, which was unfamiliar to London (in common with the remainder of Sanmartini's work), proved a lively composition full of musical interest. It was played with considerable insight, as was also the Quartet of Mozart, and in a still greater degree that of Ravel. This work is happily familiar, but the attraction of its varied fund of device seems inexhaustible. The Flonzaley Quartet were heard again on November 1, in a programme of Haydn, Friedmann Bach, and Tchaikovsky, that threw responsibility upon their purer qualities of style and proved their reliability.

The Wessely Quartet opened a season of four concerts at Bechstein Hall, on October 30, with attractive performances of Haydn's Quartet in G major, Op. 54, No. 1, Debussy's Quartet in G minor, and a Quartet in A minor by Charles Wood. The English work displayed considerable independence of thought and much ingenuity and musicianly skill.

The Cologne Quartet, of which the members are Messrs. H. Anders, W. Topstedt, F. Schmitz, and Paul Ludwig, were heard for the first time in London on November 2, on the occasion of a concert given by Mrs. England at Broadwood Rooms. It was shown in works by Mozart and Schubert that their capacities include an instinct for the playing of classical music. Songs were interpolated by Miss Grainger Kerr.

The first concert given by the Royal Academy of Music in its new Hall at Marylebone Road took place on November 4. A promising Pianoforte trio by Mr. Henry Penn was performed, and James Ching showed precocious cleverness as a pianist.

The feature of the Twelve o'clock concert given by Miss Mathilde Verne at Æolian Hall on November 7—the first of a new series—was the performance by Miss Verne (pianoforte), Mr. G. Ackroyd (flute), and Mr. A. Alexandra (bassoon) of a Beethoven Trio in G major for those instruments. The second of the series, on November 14, provided an admirable performance of Mozart's G major Pianoforte trio by Miss Verne, Miss Marian Jay, and Signor Enrico Mainardi.

Prior to their departure for a concert tour of the world, the Brothers Cherniavsky were heard on November 14 at the first of a series of Wednesday evening 'Pops.' at the Y.M.C.A., Tottenham Court Road, when they played Trios by Mendelssohn, Widor, and Brahms; and at Bechstein Hall on November 18, when they played Trios by Beethoven and Mendelssohn, and individual solos.

Concerts have been given by the Classical Concert Society at Bechstein Hall as follows: October 23, Mr. James Friskin and Señor Casals; October 30, the London String Quartet; November 6, Herr Ernst von Dohnànyi and the London String Quartet; November 13, Herr von Dohnànyi; November 20, Madame Fanny Davies and the Klingler Quartet.

The London Trio, with Mr. Louis Pecskai (violinist) as successor to Mr. Simonetti, gave an admirable performance of Schumann's D minor Trio at Æolian Hall on November 18.

VOCAL RECITALS.

There is little left to say about Miss Julia Culp's singing except to uphold it as a model in every respect. On October 28, in singing Lieder by Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms, at Bechstein Hall, she lived up to this exacting standard and gave unbounded delight to a large audience.

Recitals were given by Miss Dorothea Webb (Bechstein Hall, November 5); Miss Nellie Sargent, as both reciter and vocalist (Steinway Hall, November 5); Miss Jean Nolan, assisted by Mr. Plunket Greene (Æolian Hall, November 8); Miss Julia Hostater (Bechstein Hall, November 11); Miss Edith Clegg (Bechstein Hall, November 12); Miss Kathro Bentinck (Bechstein Hall, November 15).

Madame Saima Neovi, a Finnish soprano with an agreeable voice and style, and Miss Ellen Beck sang duets and solos at Steinway Hall on November 9.

Miss Muriel Foster, whose return to the concert-platform is more than gratifying, showed her great qualities as a lyrical singer at Bechstein Hall on November 18. No better exposition of the far-reaching possibilities of Hugo Wolf's Lieder-writing methods could be desired than that given by Miss Foster on this occasion. Songs by Brahms, Beethoven (the 'Scotch Songs') and English composers were heard to similar advantage.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

Under this heading we have to record the public performances of Mr. Max Behrens (Bechstein Hall, October 26); Madame Edith Heymann (Æolian Hall, October 26); M. Henry Etlin, a clever young pianist from the Paris Conservatoire (Bechstein Hall, October 31); Miss Winifred Christie, who played Beethoven's Thirty-two Variations (Bechstein Hall, October 31); Miss Rita Neve (Seaford House, November 1); Miss Marguerite Melville (Bechstein Hall, November 4); Miss Vera Brock (Bechstein Hall, November 5); Miss Marie Hoover-Ellis (Bechstein Hall, November 8); Mlle. Geneviève Dehelly (Æolian Hall, November 11); Miss Enid Stronach (Æolian Hall, November 12); Miss Gertrude Azulay's pupils (Steinway Hall, November 13); Mr. Arthur Newstead (Steinway Hall, November 18).

Madame Carreño achieved a double triumph at Queen's Hall, on November 6, by celebrating the jubilee of her first public appearance, and by proving that her powers are still at their zenith. She played Beethoven's E flat Sonata (Op. 31, No. 3), MacDowell's 'Keltic' Sonata, and a number of pieces by Chopin and others.

M. Paderewski's admirers crowded Queen's Hall on November 12, and were repaid with characteristic performances of Beethoven's Sonata in E, Op. 109, Chopin's B flat minor Sonata, and, of course, a number of smaller Chopin works.

The unusual experience of hearing two such eminent fellow-artists as Madame Carreño and Herr Backhaus at the same recital, was afforded at Queen's Hall on November 13. They were heard together in Mozart's Sonata in D major, Sinding's Variations in E flat minor, and Liszt's 'Concerto pathétique'—all written for two pianofortes.

Mr. Harold Bauer displayed the breadth and depth of his powers in Bach and Beethoven on November 14, and in the romantic schools on November 20. Both recitals took place at Bechstein Hall.

OTHER RECITALS AND CONCERTS.

Compositions by M. Gustave Ferrari were performed at Bechstein Hall, on October 24, by artists among whom Miss Pauline Duval showed outstanding ability as a vocalist.

Miss Dorothy Forster, assisted by Miss Carmen Hill and others as vocalists, brought forward a number of her songs at Steinway Hall on October 30.

An interesting concert of Grieg's music, consisting largely of songs, sung by Miss Ellen Beck and accompanied by Madame Grieg, was given at Æolian Hall on October 30. Pianoforte solos were played by Miss Johanne Stockmarr.

A Brahms recital was given by Madame Marie Soldat (violinist) and Mr. Donald Francis Tovey (pianist) at Bechstein Hall on October 31.

On November 2, the first Barns-Phillips concert of the season took place at Bechstein Hall. Mr. Phillips sang Schumann's 'Dichterliebe' song-cycle in an ably-written English translation by Mrs. R. H. Elkin, and Miss Barns and Mr. Percy Waller were heard in César Franck's Violin sonata.

Miss Annie Godfrey showed exceptional talent as a violinist at Queen's Hall on November 5. Her felicitous performance of Tchaikovsky's Concerto was accompanied by the New Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Landon Ronald. Songs were given by Miss Maria Talesi.

Miss Margaret H. Glyn gave a concert of her own works at Æolian Hall on November 5, with the assistance of Miss Florence Greenwood and Mr. William Waite (vocalists), and Mr. E. Douglas-Smith (organist), and showed considerable imagination and resource, but less insight as a composer than she has shown as a musical æsthetist.

Three Sonatas, by Schumann (D minor), Brahms (G major), and Juon (A major), were played by Miss Grace Adams (violinist) and Miss Ella Delap (pianist) at Bechstein Hall on November 6.

At Æolian Hall, on November 8, Miss Vivien Hughes displayed among other special capabilities as a violinist a rich tone, firm execution, and an eloquent, expressive manner.

A notable performance of César Franck's 'Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue,' given at Æolian Hall on November 7, placed him far higher as a pianist than his Sonata, heard for the first time, placed him as a composer. Madame Sylvia York Bowen sang with pleasant voice.

Violin recitals were given by Mr. Godfrey Ludlow at Æolian Hall on November 14, and by Mr. Reuben Lunan at Bechstein Hall on November 15.

Viola da gamba, harpsichord, and flute, played respectively by Miss Hélène Dolmetsch, Miss Dorothy Moggridge, and Mr. A. Fransella, were brought into service for a pleasant concert of old music given by Miss Dolmetsch at Æolian Hall on November 15. Mr. Frederick Keel assisted with an appropriate selection of songs.

Mr. Landon Ronald's songs have never wanted for popularity, and a large audience came to hear a programme of them at Bechstein Hall on November 16 Their characteristics of refined melody and interesting accompaniment were conspicuously revealed.

Suburban Concerts.

Miss Marie Goulden, a promising young pianist, in a recital at the Public Hall, Croydon, on November 8, gave evidence—in pieces ranging from Scarlatti to Liszt—of a highly-musical temperament and an excellent technique. She was assisted by Madame Sobrino (songs) and Miss Olive Kershaw (violin).

An excellent performance of Gounod's 'Faust' was given by the People's Palace Choral and Orchestral Society, under the direction of Mr. Frank Idle, on Saturday, November 9, a large and enthusiastic audience being present. The choral singing attained a very high standard, and the accompaniments, played by a full orchestra led by Mr. George Wilby, were a feature of the concert. The principals were Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. Joseph Reed, Mr. Arthur Rose, and Mr. William Waite, all of whom acquitted themselves well. Mr. Smith Webster was at the organ.

On November 2 a successful concert was given by Miss Christabel Baxendale (violinist) at the Public Hall, West Norwood. Miss Gertrud Bauer (pianoforte) and Mr. Campbell Carr (baritone) assisted.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BELFAST

The season of the Philharmonic Society opened with a miscellaneous concert on October 25. Much interest was felt in musical circles on the first appearance of the Society's new conductor, Mr. E. Godfrey Brown, who took up his residence a few months ago, and since the holiday season ended has kept his forces hard at work. The work of the choir and orchestra included Elgar's 'The Snow' and 'Fly, singing bird,' and Balfour Gardiner's 'News from Whydah,' and the choir, unaccompanied, sang Max Bruch's six-part song 'Morning song of praise.' The solo-singers were Miss Ellen Beck and Signor Lenghi-Cellini. The orchestra played the overture to 'Figaro,' Percy Grainger's 'Mock Morris,' Jarnefeldt's 'Præludium,' and the 'Jubal' Overture of Weber. A very large audience showed their appreciation by the heartiest applause and numerous encores, and the local Press unanimously praise most enthusiastically the excellent finish of the work prepared by Mr. Brown. Altogether the committee of the Society deserves congratulation upon this auspicious opening of what may be hoped will prove a career of prosperity. Mr. Brown has shown himself to be a thoroughly equipped conductor with stores of knowledge and experience, so that the continued upward progress of the material, vocal and instrumental, at his command may be confidently expected in the future.

BIRMINGHAM.

The concerts in Birmingham are being constantly increased in number, but really few pay their way, and not even artists of first rank in the musical world draw large audiences here this season. Thus the Melba Concert, given in the Town Hall on November 11, although the famous cantatrice had for her coadjutors Herr Backhaus, Herr Zigeti, and Mr. Edmund Burke, was wretchedly attended ; nor did Miss Marie Hall, Mr. Mark Hambourg, and Mr. Cuthbert Allan attract a large audience to the Town Hall on November 5. On the other hand, the Gramophone Company's Concert, which took place in the Town Hall on October 22, proved a huge success, the great attraction being the New Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Landon Ronald. In addition to the Orchestra, Miss Irene Scharrer, a great favourite with Birmingham audiences, was a host in herself, receiving quite an ovation after her virile performance of Liszt's 'Hungarian Fantasia' for pianoforte and orchestra. A novelty was Mr. Landon Ronald's arrangement of Bizet's Suite, 'L'Arlésienne,' effectively and picturesquely scored. The vocalist was the Welsh tenor, Mr. Evan Williams, who enjoys a great reputation in America

Leoncavallo and his Italian singers appeared at the Grand Theatre on October 28 and the following nights, in the maestro's 'I Pagliacci,' conducted by him. The work was given in truly Italian fashion, evoking considerable enthusiasm. Leoncavallo had chosen Birmingham as the only provincial city to visit, as he was anxious to appear in and to be associated with a city that saw the birth of 'Elijah,' 'The Redemption,' 'Mors et Vita,' and 'Gerontius. The Birmingham Symphony Orchestra gave their first popular orchestral concert in the Town Hall on October 26, under Mr. Julian Clifford's excellent conductorship, introducing several novelties. The vocalist was Madame Blanche Marchesi, an artist one hears only too rarely in Birmingham. Of interest was the first performance here of Percy Fletcher's suite, 'Woodland pictures,' a pleasing, bright work, effectively scored, to which complete justice was done. Mr. Max Mossel's first Drawing-room Concert of the present series was held in the Grosvenor Room, Grand Hotel, on October 30. The whole programme was supplied by Madame Julia Culp, the accomplished Lieder singer. The audience at these concerts is as a rule cold and unsympathetic, and although Madame Culp sang as gloriously as ever, there was hardly a recall vouchsafed to her. On the Marie Hall concert evening there was also an interesting chamber concert given at Queen's College by the Arthur Catterall String Quartet, an exceedingly efficient and admirably-equipped body of instrumentalists—indeed, one of the best quartets in England composed of Englishmen. The annual Police Concert, at which our excellent City Police Band took part, was crowded as usual, the vocal items being supplied by Miss Emily Breare, Miss Ethel Hook, Mr. Ernest Pike, and Mr. Thorpe Bates. The accompanist was Mr. George Atkinson.

The Birmingham Choral Union's first concert of the season was given on November 9, in the Town Hall, the attendance being so great that hundreds were unable to gain admission. The work performed was 'Elijah,' which our masses have known from their childhood, and of which they never tire. It is strange, but nevertheless true, that both the 'Messiah' and 'Elijah' have never drawn such enormous audiences as this season, whereas orchestral concerts are badly patronised. Of the performance one has to speak in high terms of praise; indeed, Mr. Richard Wassell, the new conductor of the Society, who succeeds Mr. Thomas Facer, has at once shown that he is the right man in the right place—a sound musician possessing temperament and artistic taste, of whom much will be expected. The choir never sang better, giving evidence of careful preparation, and the orchestra too was by far the best that has been heard at similar functions. The principal artists were Madame Laura Taylor, Miss Millicent Lake, Mr. Jesse Hacket, and Mr. James Coleman. The usual place at the organ was occupied by Mr. C. W. Perkins.

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society's first concert of the current series, given in the Town Hall on November 6, was devoted to a performance of Berlioz's dramatic legend 'Faust,' always a popular work with local audiences ever since Mr. Stockley gave it here for the first time in 1882. Dr. Sinclair conducted a fairly satisfactory performance on the whole, but some of the tempi were hurried and consequently much was lost in character and substance. The choir lacked in weight and sonority, especially in the Pandemonium scene, being in a measure overweighted by the orchestra. The Fugue on Brander's song went well, also the closing scene of the chorus of Sylphs. The cast of principals included Miss Edith Evans (Margaret), Mr. Frank Mullings (Faust), Mr. James Coleman (Brander), and Mr. Thorpe Bates (Mephistopheles).

The Birmingham Philharmonic Society will give only four orchestral concerts this season, instead of eight, each to be directed under a different conductor. The first of the series was given in the Town Hall on November 13, under Mr. Michael Balling, who has succeeded Dr. Hans Richter as conductor of the Hallé Concerts in Manchester. He is evidently a conductor of temperament who obtains some startling effects with his orchestra, a feature of his art being keen sense of rhythm, accent, and phrasing. He made an excellent impression here with the fine performance of Schubert's great Symphony in C, written in 1828, which the composer was destined never to hear. The programme also comprised Berlioz's overture, 'Benvenuto Cellini,' Brahms's 'Variations on a Chorale by Haydn,' Strauss's symphonic-poem, 'Don Juan,' and the Vorspiel to 'Parsifal.'

Opera is well represented in Birmingham this season. The Thomas Quinlan Opera Company opened a fortnight's operatic season, on November 18, at the Theatre Royal, the novelty given being Charpentier's 'Louise.' Wagner was represented by one performance each of the 'Valkyrie,' 'Tristan und Isolde,' 'Tannhäuser,' and 'Lohengrin,' and Mozart by 'Le Nozze di Figaro.' The other operas were Offenbach's 'Tales of Hoffmann,' and Puccini's 'Madame Butterfly,' 'Carmen,' 'Faust,' and 'Aïda.' The booking was so great that all local records were broken, each performance being crowded out. The Carl-Rosa Opera is announced to appear at the Prince of Wales Theatre for one week, the season to open on December 2. The only novelty is centred in a revival of Boito's 'Mefistofele,' which has not been heard here since nearly a quarter of a century ago, when it was given by the Carl Rosa Company.

The Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association gave its first concert of the season in the Town Hall, November 16, the work chosen for performance being Haydn's 'Creation,' which received a vivid and descriptive interpretation, the singing of the choir revealing many good features, as also did the playing of the orchestra. The principal parts were ably sung by Madame Aimée Wathen-Cole, Mr. Tom Field, and Mr. Nat Bishop. The conductor was Mr. Joseph H. Adams, and Mr. C. W. Perkins dealt ably with the organ part.

BOURNEMOUTH.

A continuous round of concerts bids us recognise that the winter season is now well under way, various ventures and activities calling for consideration.

First place is demanded by the Symphony Concerts, which have been as excellent in intention and performance as in years past, but it must regretfully be admitted that the anticipated increase in patronage has shown but little development, a proof that the high-class concert public here is not a very extensive one. And yet ample provision is made for all shades of opinion, as witness the performances during the past month of Symphonies of Mozart (G minor), Brahms (C minor), Schumann (No. 4), and Schubert (the 'Unfinished'); and of Smetana's 'Bartered Bride' Overture, Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennel's Dance,' Wagner's 'Meistersinger' Overture, Ipollitov-Ivanov's 'Scènes Caucasiennes' Suite, Weber's 'Euryanthe' Overture, Elgar's 'Enigma Variations,' Dvorák's 'Carneval' Overture, and Strauss's 'Don Juan.' The soloists at these concerts, with the works they performed, comprised Mr. Godfrey Ludlow (Max Bruch's Scottish Fantasia for violin), Miss Marie Gesellschap (Liszt's Pianoforte concerto in A), Mr. Arnold Trowell (Schumann's Violoncello concerto), and Miss Tosta de Benici (Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto).

On the whole, the Monday 'Pops' have been better attended and appreciated than the Symphony Concerts. The 'one-composer' programmes have apparently not wearied the audiences, and the solitary 'national' programme to date was particularly successful. The following have been the principal features of this new series up to the time of writing: October 21, Grieg Concert ('Peer Gynt' Suite No. 1). October 28, Liszt Concert (Tone-poems, 'Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne' and 'Les Préludes'; Hungarian Fantasie for pianoforte, played by Miss Edith Leah, a local artist). November 4, French music ('Platée' Suite No. 1, by Rameau; 'Carneval Romain' Overture, Berlioz; 'Hymne à St. Cecile,' Gounod; 'L'Arlésienne' Suite No. 1, by Bizet; Boellmann's Symphonic Variations for Violoncello, played by Mr. Fred Dunworth, of the Municipal Orchestra; Symphonic-poem, 'Le Rouet d'Omphale,' by C. Saint-Saëns; Scherzo 'L'Apprenti Sorcier,' by Dukas). This programme covered a good deal of ground, and was exceedingly interesting in its historical aspect. November 11, Tchaikovsky concert ('Romeo and Juliet' Overture, 'Casse Noisette' Suite, 'Sérénade mélancolique' for violin, played by Mr. Algernon Holland, of the Municipal Orchestra). More time, too, has been allotted at these concerts for chamber music, and we have to record performances of Hummel's Septet (Messrs. King-Hall, Gennin, Onez, Pearce, Dunworth, Fawcett, and Birch) and a Quartet for horns by Belloli (Messrs. Trevisone, Beltrami, Demarino, and Ladley), the executants in both cases being drawn from the ranks of the orchestra.

Other events have included an orchestral concert at which Kreisler was the great attraction, his interpretations of Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto and the G minor of Max Bruch being as near perfection as human hands and intelligence can approach; a pleasant recital by Madame Clara Butt and Mr. Kennerley Rumford, assisted by M. Tivadar Nachez, Mr. Felix Salmond, and Mr. Harold Craxton; a visit from Madame Liza Lehmann and Lady Beerbohm Tree, the latter giving with real dramatic intuition some recitations to the not very profound musical accompaniments invented (and tastefully played) by Madame Lehmann. On November 2, a delightful afternoon's entertainment was furnished by Madame Grieg, Miss Ellen Beck, and Miss Johanne Stockmarr; the last-named performer played with all her customary skill, and Miss Beck's highly artistic singing was much enhanced by Madame Grieg's charming accompaniments; the recital was entirely devoted to the compositions of Grieg. A pianoforte duet recital given by Carreño and Backhaus, on November 9, was a novelty of exceptional interest, their joint efforts being supplemented by some brilliantly played solos.

BRISTOL.

The first of Mr. Hubert Hunt's season of chamber music concerts was held at the Victoria Rooms on November 4, and attracted a large audience. The executants—Mr. Hubert Hunt and Miss K. Tudor Pole (violins), Miss Gladys Home (viola), and Mr. Roger Bucknall (violoncello)—interpreted adequately the C minor Quartet (Op. 51) of Brahms, and Mendelssohn's unfinished Quartet, Andante, Scherzo, and Capriccio (Op. 81). A charming performance of Schubert's Octet followed, the executants, in addition to those already named, being M. Jules van Hemel (clarinet), Mr. F. T. Stephens (horn), Mr. C. Bayman (bassoon), and Mr. C. Weiss (double-bass).

The St. George Male-Voice Choir, on November 11, interested a large number of hearers at their concert at the Drill Hall, under the direction of Mr. F. Smith. Mr. Handel G. Lovell was the accompanist. In addition to the pieces by the choir, there were songs given by Miss Lydia Edith Terrell, Miss Marion Neale, Miss Griffin, and Mr. Howard Rees. Madame Howell-Jones recited, and Mr. Hamblin contributed a piccolo solo.

The annual concert at Stoke Bishop Hall on November 12 was highly successful, the performance being in aid of the Men's Club. Vocal and instrumental pieces were interpreted by Miss Dorothy Brain, Mrs. Stanley Davis, Mr. A. J. Eastman, the Rev. R. L. Whytehead, and Mr. C. Thomas (vocalists), and Miss Gertrude Dodd, Miss May Wallace, Mr. Eric Luton, and Mr. Pearson (instrumentalists). Miss V. S. Russell and Mr. Stanley Davis contributed recitations.

On November 16 the opening lecture of the Music Teachers' Association was given at the Bristol Musical Club by Mr. Percy Scholes, whose subject was 'Music: as it was, as it is, as it will be.' Mr. Hubert Hunt presided. At the close of the lecture discussion was invited, and among those who took part were Dr. Merrick, Mr. Harold Bernard, and Mr. Ernest Crichton.

On November 18 the musicians who are familiarly known as the Clifton Quintet, gave their first concert for the season at the Victoria Rooms, and interested a numerous audience. Ernest Chausson's Concerto in D for pianoforte, violin and string quartet was well played by Mr. Herbert Parsons and Mr. Maurice Alexander, with Messrs. Otto Milani, Albert Morgan, Alfred Best, and Percy Lewis. The Trio in E flat (Op. 40), by Brahms, for pianoforte, violin, and horn was given acceptably by Messrs. Parsons, Alexander, and E. T. Stephens. Grieg's Quartet in G minor (Op. 27) was the other concerted piece. Two violoncello solos by Florent Schmitt, were effectively performed by Mr. Percy Lewis.

The Bristol Symphony Orchestra gave a concert at Victoria Rooms on November 20, under the direction of Mr. F. S. Gardner. The principal work was the 'New World' Symphony of Dvorák, and this was satisfactorily interpreted. Among other compositions which displayed the efficiency of the players were 'Finlandia' (Sibelius), 'Egmont' Overture (Beethoven), and Ballet Suite 'L'Arlésienne' (Bizet). Songs were effectively contributed by Mr. Marcus Thomson.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

The past month has been a busy one, though no event of novel or startling character has to be recorded. Wesley Choir (Plymouth), augmented and supported by an orchestra, sang 'St. Paul,' on October 23, under the conductorship of Mr. A. R. Pappin, their performance being characterized by good tone and expressive feeling. The principals were the Misses Hilda Blake and Marion Brimnell, Messrs. Will Foster and Ernest White. On the following Wednesday, October 30, Dr. Weekes's choral class sang 'Elijah,' under the baton of Mr. Walter Weekes, upon whom has fallen the conductor's mantle of his father. The inner parts of the choir were weak, but the tone was refined and well under control in the matter of light and shade, the pianissimo being unusually effective. The band was led by Mr. R. H. V. Ball, and the principal singers were the Misses Esta d'Argo, Edith Evans, and Messrs. Frank Mullings and Herbert Brown, among whom chief honours were won by the last named in the rôle of the Prophet. The weekly Corporation concerts on November 2 were entirely in the hands of Mr. David Parkes and his Orpheus Male Choir. Maunder's descriptive chorus, 'To arms,' was sung with compelling spirit and convincing atmosphere; and by force of contrast equally good was the performance given of part-songs by Brahms and Abt. Schubert's 'Die Allmacht' was excellently sung by the choir, but they were not happy in the choice of the soprano soloist. The choirs of King Street Wesleyan and Stonehouse Wesleyan Churches amalgamated on November 6 to sing Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer' (with Miss L. Burston as soloist), choruses by Stainer, Gounod, Mendelssohn, and Haydn, and various concerted numbers. Mr. H. Woodward conducted, with Mr. C. Palmer at the organ. Mr. N. H. R. Normington, organist of Mount Gold Wesleyan Church, was responsible for a creditable performance by the choir, on November 13, of 'The Daughter of Jairus,' with a small band and organ (Mr. D. Parkes).

The Misses Smith opened a second series of musical matinées at Plymouth, on October 23, with very fair subscription support. By their enterprise, a visit was secured from Mr. Leonard Borwick, who introduced his own arrangement of Handel's 'The harmonious blacksmith,' and also played works by Schumann, Chopin, Scriabine, Debussy, Ravel, and Liszt. Bach's Double Concerto for two violins was played by Miss Giulietta Motto and Miss Lily Smith. At Mr. J. W. Newton's second symphony concert at Stonehouse, on November 12, the programme included Mozart's Symphony No. 31, a 'Suite pour orchestre' by Saint-Saëns, and pieces by Spohr and Tchaikovsky. Mr. C. C. Manning, flautist, played a Concerto for his instrument with orchestra, by Godard.

Mr. Harold Lake, a native of Plymouth, is the first to represent the town in the roll of Oxford Doctors of Music, having gained the degree at the comparatively early age of thirty-four. His exercise was a concert-overture and an oratorio on the subject of 'Deborah and Barak.'

The chief event of a week's tenancy of the Theatre Royal by the Royal Carl-Rosa Company on October 14-19, was the introduction to the West of Boito's 'Mefistofele.' The Western Amateur Operatic Society occupied the Palladium at Devonport, from November 11 to 16, with a series of performances of 'The Yeomen of the Guard.'

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

Owing to a deficit of £16 15*s.* on the funds of Newton Abbot Choral Society, the committee have decided to postpone any arrangements for a concert until the debt be paid. Mr. W. J. Bown is the conductor. 'The Messiah' was performed at Union Street Wesleyan Church, Torquay, on October 30, by a choir and orchestra of 200, Mr. Ernest W. Cross conducting. Madame Anna Shergold, Mrs. Wallace Marsland, Messrs. Frank Webster and Joseph Farrington were the soloists. The same choir journeyed to Newton Abbot, on November 7, to join the Wesleyan Choir there in Sullivan's Festival Te Deum and choruses by Elvey and Mendelssohn, Mr. Coleridge D. White conducting. A cantata, 'The little Maid of Israel,' was sung by the Tetcott United Methodist Choir, on October 26. Eight choirs in the South Molton Deanery gathered for the choral festival, on October 22, in the fine Parish Church, South Molton, the total number of voices being 120. Spark in D was the setting for the canticles, and the anthem was 'Father of Mercies, God of Love' (Vine Hall). A new Choral Union for Free Church choirs has been formed in Exmouth and district, and at the first united service, on November 12, at Beacon, Mr. A. J. Hawkins conducted. Meavy Parish Church was the centre of meeting, on October 23, for the bell-ringers of Tavistock Deanery, when ringing began at 2.30 p.m. and continued until late evening. Twelve parishes were represented.

On November 15, at the annual concert at Exeter of the Isca Glee Singers, a harmonized setting of 'Drake's Drum' was introduced. The members of the quartet sang solos, and assistance was given by Miss Dorothy George (contralto), Mr. Otto Milani (violin) and Mr. Charles Wreford (reciter).

The managers of the new Torquay Pavilion are enterprising and, on October 23, arranged a first visit of Mr. John McCormack, which proved greatly successful. The Municipal Orchestra, of which Mr. Basil Hindenberg is the hard-working conductor, have inaugurated a series of symphony concerts, and on November 13, Tchaikovsky's 'Pathétique' was interpreted with deep expression. The Haydn String Quartet at Torquay gave at their nineteenth concert on October 24, Beethoven's Quartet in G (Op. 18, No. 2), and Dvorák's in E flat (Op. 51). Miss Margaret Mortimer was the vocalist. At Barnstaple, on November 1, Dr. H. J. Edwards in the course of a pianoforte recital of high standard played an 'Arabesque' of his own composition, a dainty and well-constructed little piece, and joined Miss Avice Sealy in Grieg's Sonata in F for violin and pianoforte. Miss Phyllis Lett, the vocalist, introduced a song, 'The lamplighter,' from a set of children's pieces composed by Dr. Edwards, and also sang the contralto solo from his oratorio 'The Ascension.'

Torquay Amateur Operatic Society, of which Mr. G. W. Goss is musical director, have selected 'The Princess of Kensington' for performance in the new year. Mrs. Herring Mason has established an Operatic Society at Ashburton, which, without outside help, performed 'The Pirates of Penzance' on October 29 and 30, the chief feature of the performances being the beautiful singing of Miss Fifine de la Côte. Adapted as a children's opera, 'The Forty Thieves' was successfully performed at Exeter on November 11, by 120 children trained by Mr. Percy A. Nicholls.

CORNWALL.

Launceston Choral Society (conductor, Mr. S. Parsonson) are preparing to perform the first two parts of 'Hiawatha' at their next concert. It is unusual and gratifying to note that the finances of this Society are in a thoroughly healthy condition. Delabole Quartet were the chief performers in a concert in the town on November 12. An organ recital was given in Mylor Wesleyan Church on November 13, by Mr. F. R. Myatt, of Falmouth; and the Falmouth Baptist Choir sang choruses.

Mr. H. M. Lamerton's private Orchestral Society supplied the main part of the programme at a concert at Bodmin, on October 30. St. Agnes town band gave a concert on November 9; and in the Penzance New Pavilion on November 15, Mr. S. W. A. Moyle gave a violoncello recital, including a Concerto in D minor for his instrument by Jules de Swert, with Mrs. Moyle at the pianoforte. Assistance was given by Miss Nellie Thomas and Mr. C. Jasper (vocalists), with Mr. H. C. Tonking at the organ.

DUBLIN.

On October 28, the Chamber Music Recitals began at the Royal Dublin Society with a pianoforte recital by Dr. Esposito. The principal item in an interesting programme was a new Sonata (still in MS.), by Carlo Albanesi. It proved a really fine work, and was beautifully played by Dr. Esposito.

On November 4, the St. Petersburg String Quartet made their first appearance here, and played Borodin in A, Beethoven, Op. 18, No. 2, in G, and variations on a Russian theme by ten Russian composers. The beautiful delicacy of their playing was greatly appreciated by a large audience.

On November 11, Dr. Brodsky, Carl Fuchs, and Dr. Esposito, played an interesting programme consisting of the Mozart Trio in G, Beethoven's Violoncello sonata in A, Op. 69, and Schubert's Trio in B flat.

On November 18, Leonard Borwick attracted a very large audience. His programme included Beethoven's 'Appassionata,' and among the smaller pieces, Debussy's Toccata and Ravel's 'Le Gibet,' the latter being one of the most poetically played numbers in the programme.

At the Sunday Orchestral Concerts, the programmes during the past month have included Schubert's 'Unfinished'; Beethoven's 'Second and Fifth'; Mendelssohn's 'Italian'; and Haydn's 'Surprise' Symphonies. The soloists have included Signor Simonetti and Mr. Patrick Delany (violinists), Dr. Esposito (pianist), Mr. H. Leeming (flute). The vocalists included Miss Edith Mortier, Miss Alice Rafter, Miss Nettie Edwards, and Mr. John C. Browner.

GLASGOW.

Mr. A. M. Henderson's two Subscription Chamber Concerts, on October 24 and November 7 respectively, were remarkably successful in every way. At the former, Mr. Henderson, as pianist, played a well-chosen programme of pieces by Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, and Chopin, the Bach selection including the pianist's own clever transcription of one of the organ Choral Preludes. Dr. George Henschel, as vocalist, sang inimitably no fewer than fourteen songs. The St. Petersburg Quartet (Court Quartet) appeared at the second concert, their programme including Beethoven's String quartet in G major (Op. 18, No. 2), Tchaikovsky's String quartet in D major, and Schumann's Quartet in E flat for pianoforte and strings (Op. 47), Mr. Henderson playing the pianoforte part. The first Festival of the Beltane Society was held on October 23, 25, 26. Among the objects of the Society are the cultivation among the younger generation of a knowledge of Scottish folk-songs, ballads, dances, and singing-games, and the collection and publication of the original airs and correct settings of Scottish songs. The promoters were fortunate in securing the services of Miss Jenny Taggart, Mr. Robert Burnett, and Mr. Charles Tree as solo vocalists. The mixed-voice choir, recently formed by Mr. H. A. L. Seligmann, made their initial public appearance on November 29. That the members possess good voices and plenty of enthusiasm was shown in their performance of an unambitious but pleasing selection of part-songs and madrigals. Those who had the privilege of hearing Dr. Walford Davies's lecture, under the auspices of the Bach Choir, on November 30, had an unalloyed pleasure. Taking as his subject 'The Art of Bach and Modern Music,' Dr. Davies showed that Bach was an 'experimentalist' rather than an 'intellectualist,' and that he was an incorrigible 'programme' composer. Explanatory remarks accompanied the lecturer's excellent playing of his illustrations, one of which was 'The Saints in Glory' Fugue.

On November 5, Madame Curzon-Watt, a gifted local pianist with more than a local reputation, gave a recital of exceptional merit. In numbers by Bach, Schumann, and Chopin, she revealed technical and interpretative powers of a high order; but the event of the evening was her fine performance of Brahms's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Handel.

The Choral and Orchestral Union opened their season on November 12. A few evenings previously, the management gave a semi-public reception to Mr. Emil Mlynarski, the conductor, and if the enthusiasm prevailing on that occasion can be taken as an indication, the coming season gives promise of much success. The personnel of the Scottish Orchestra is practically the same as last year, and the opening concert found the band playing with a fine unanimity and verve. The programme was on familiar lines, and included the overture to 'The Flying Dutchman,' Beethoven's fourth Symphony, and Tchaikovsky's 'Mozartiana' Suite. The beautiful singing of the solo vocalist, Miss Ellen Beck, gave a note of distinction to the evening's music. Hitherto municipal recognition of Art has been limited almost wholly to sculpture and painting. This year for the first time it extends to high-class music, and the City Corporation have engaged the Scottish Orchestra to give four concerts at cheap prices to East-End audiences. The result of the experiment will be watched with interest, and one can only hope that the new departure may be the beginning of a new order of things, at least so far as a municipally-supported musical scheme is concerned.

The Glasgow Grand Opera Society, under the skilful direction of Mr. R. Hutton Malcolm, gave performances of Bizet's 'Carmen' on November 14, 15, 16. Except for the unavoidable crowding, due to the smallness of the stage, the presentation of the opera was exceptionally good. The chorus-singing was quite above that of the average travelling company; the soloists sang and acted with freedom, and altogether the touch of the amateur was seldom in evidence. A small but effective orchestra, led by Mr. E. R. Joachim, provided the accompaniments.

The first of the Saturday Popular Orchestral Concerts took place on November 16, before one of the largest audiences ever drawn to these concerts. Beethoven's fifth Symphony was the chief number on the programme, and Miss Ellen Beck, as solo vocalist, confirmed the fine impression she made at the previous Tuesday concert. Brahms's 'Requiem' and Act 3 of Wagner's 'Parsifal'—the latter given for the first time in Scotland—formed the programme of the first choral concert on November 19. In the 'Requiem' the Choral Union sang with a vigour approaching occasionally to roughness; but save for a lapse by the tenor section in the fugal chorus, 'Worthy art Thou,' the music was sung with accuracy and good effect. In 'Parsifal' the small share of choral music was performed quite effectively. The solo numbers in the 'Requiem' were given by Miss Rhoda von Glehn and Mr. Campbell McInnes, the latter also being associated with Messrs. Morgan Kingston and Montague Borwell in the 'Parsifal' music. The Scottish Orchestra played brilliantly, and Mr. Emil Mlynarski directed the concert with ability.

The Quinlan Opera Company gave a fortnight's performances in the Theatre Royal, and large audiences were the rule. The répertoire of the company embraced fourteen different operas, one of which, Charpentier's 'Louise,' was given here for the first time. Mr. Quinlan has set a high standard in point of stage-setting, singing, and acting, and the large measure of public support he has secured is thoroughly well-deserved.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

The second concert of the Philharmonic Society, on October 22, was conducted by Mr. Willem Mengelberg, the eminent Amsterdam musician, whose interpretative command was shown in thoroughly satisfactory performances of such a varied selection of music as Cherubini's 'Anacreon' Overture, Tchaikovsky's 'Romeo and Juliet' Overture, with Schumann's fourth Symphony and Strauss's 'Tod und Verklärung.' Tartini's Violoncello concerto in D major was admirably played by Señor Casals, and not the least enjoyable item in a fine programme was Dr. J. C. Bridge's part-song, 'It was a lover and his lass,' which was brightly and effectively sung by the choir. Their share, however, in the production of Dr. Walford Davies's 'Song of St. Francis,' at the third concert, on November 5, cannot be described as entirely satisfactory. It gave the impression of imperfect preparation. It is certain that pleasurable anticipation of a hearing of Dr. Davies's constructively fine essay in modern choral and orchestral writing was not realised. The composer's method of emotional expression by means of complex polyphony and absence of obvious melody is one which makes few allowances for the ordinary choir, or the weakness of the ordinary audience. The vocal principals were Miss Ada Forrest, Madame Doris Woodall, Mr. Edward Davies, and Mr. Thorpe Bates. The second part of the concert, conducted by Sir Frederic Cowen, was devoted to a performance of Berlioz's dramatic symphony, 'Romeo and Juliet,' for solo contralto, tenor, and baritone, with chorus and orchestra. It is a work which is not specially worth reviving, except perhaps for the 'Queen Mab' Scherzo, which was finely played.

The Quinlan Opera Company very sensibly increased their artistic reputation by the exceedingly fine performances given in the Hippodrome during the fortnight ending November 2. It speaks volumes for the ability and resourcefulness of the company that no fewer than twelve different operas were staged on a magnificent scale during the fortnight's visit, three performances being given of Offenbach's 'Tales of Hoffmann.' One of the largest audiences was drawn by the production here of Charpentier's 'Louise,' on October 31, in which Miss Jeanne Brola took the title-rôle, associated with Miss Edna Thornton (Mother), Mr. W. J. Samuell (Father), and Mr. Maurice D'Oisly (Julian). Mr. Tullio Voghera conducted, and shared in the appreciation which was shown at the end of this interesting work. The opera was finely staged and played throughout with great animation. It is a matter of regret that the performances were generally not better attended. But there were other powerful attractions offered to the public during this fortnight.

Under the direction of Mr. Vasco Akeroyd, with whom Mr. S. de Kusel is associated in the business management, the concerts of the Akeroyd Symphony Orchestra were resumed in the Philharmonic Hall on October 29, when the programme included the first hearing in Liverpool of Beethoven's 'Jena' Symphony. Professor Stein's discovery may not be altogether regarded as 'treasure-trove,' but the Symphony is certainly interesting as affording evidences of a great composer in the making. The greater elasticity of musical expression since Beethoven wrote the 'Jena' was shown by the admirable performances Mr. Akeroyd directed of the 'Venusberg' music from 'Tannhäuser' and the B flat minor Pianoforte concerto of Tchaikovsky, in which the solo part was ardently and brilliantly played by Mr. Frederic Brandon. Two groups of songs by Schubert and Brahms were sung in finished style by Madame Julia Culp. For the second concert, on November 12, Mr. Akeroyd provided another interesting scheme, including Brahms's noble C minor Symphony, which was nobly played, Smetana's overture, 'The Bartered Bride,' and the Preludes to Acts 2 and 3 of Wolf-Ferrari's opera, 'Jewels of the Madonna.' Miss Marie Hall played Mendelssohn's Violin concerto with abundant skill, and a delicate beauty of tone.

The two concerts given by the St. Petersburg String Quartet on November 6 and 16 gave delight to highly-appreciative, if also limited, audiences in St. George's Hall. The programmes enlarged our knowledge of modern Russian quartets by Glazounow, A major, Op. 64, Roudolph in G minor, Tanéïèw, C major, Op. 5, No. 2, and the ten composite Variations on a Russian popular theme, written by ten representative Russian composers. Mr. Ronald Nicholson provided vocal relief in tenor songs sung with artistic intention, accompanied by Mr. Herbert Morris.

The fortnightly Monday meetings of the Rodewald Concert Club continue to be well attended. The programme on October 28 took the form of a pianoforte recital by Mr. Frederic Brandon, who was appreciatively heard in a new Pianoforte suite in four movements by Mr. Ernest Bryson, entitled 'Through the little meadows,' a series of graceful and fanciful miniatures which show indications of the composer's habit of thinking orchestrally.

At the third meeting, on November 11, an interesting recital of folk-songs was given by the Volkslied Quartet. Notable features were Brahms's 'Cradle-song of the Virgin,' with viola obbligato (Mr. T. Rimmer), and Dr. James Lyon's effective arrangement of the Manx folk-song, 'Ny Kirree fo niaghtey' ('The sheep under the snow').

A memorial to the heroic bandsmen who went down with the 'Titanic' was placed on November 4 in the gallery crush-room of the Philharmonic Hall. It is in the form of a large tablet with the inscription worked in copper, and is from an anonymous donor. The designer is Mr. J. A. Odell, of the Liverpool School of Art.

Under the will of the late Mr. Thomas Bartlett the new Cathedral is to be provided with a peal of twelve bells and a clock for the exterior at an estimated cost of £7,500. Attention has already been drawn to the Barrow bequest, which has provided a large sum for the great organ which is now under construction by Messrs. Willis, the builders of the smaller instrument in the Lady Chapel, in which the daily services are now held.

The Warrington Musical Society, which numbers 200 performers in the choir and orchestra, sang Sir Charles Stanford's 'Phaudrig Crohoore' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Viking Song' in the Parr Hall on November 6. Madame Marie Brema sang, and Mr. Naum Blinder gave violin solos. A feature of the miscellaneous music was the 'Valse lente' by Mr. F. H. Crossley, the Society's able conductor.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

For absolute musical interest the record of accomplishment during recent weeks has been far greater in the domain of chamber music than in orchestral work. On the occasion of the visit of Messrs. Busoni and Kreisler, we heard again that wonderful second Sonata in E minor by Busoni, which was first introduced to the English-speaking world (if not to Europe) by Dr. Brodsky and the late W. H. Dayas at a Brodsky quartet concert here in February, 1902. Even after such a long interval, during which much water has flowed under our musical bridges, the Kreisler-Busoni performance compelled a more complete realisation of the justice of Dayas's claim for Busoni that, in this sonata, he links up with the later Beethoven.

At one of the gatherings of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, thanks to the recent joint labours of Professor Karl Klindworth and Mr. Frederick Dawson, we had the first performance here of the famous 'Goldberg' Variations of Bach, composed over 170 years ago for a two-manual clavier. Most of the difficulties attendant upon the transfer of such a work to one keyboard have been overcome quite satisfactorily. Prior to its performance Mr. Dawson gave his audience an analytical survey of the composition, which, omitting repeats, lasts about thirty-three minutes.

The first concert of the Musical Society, on October 25, was devoted to the works of Harry Baynton-Power (a young Lancashire composer, until recently at the Royal College here), and on November 8 Mr. Isidor Cohn gave us our most considerable insight, so far, into the pianoforte work of Erich Korngold, particular interest attaching to the first and second Sonatas and the 'Märchenbilder,' on mottoes from Hans Andersen's 'Fairy-tales.' Korngold, unlike his great exemplar Strauss, is not powerfully influenced by very definite poetical ideas; but he handles the most audacious harmonic effects with an unerring sense of just relationship which proves conclusively that his musical speech is spontaneous and instinctive. A few days later, Mr. Max Mayer supplemented these Korngold pianoforte works with the Trio for violin, 'cello, and pianoforte, in which Miss May Mukle and Mr. Arthur Catterall joined.

The second Brodsky Quartet Concert proved conclusively that the change of venue, and substitution of matinée for evening performances, have not materially affected financial support. Reger has found recognition elsewhere in Manchester, but not until November 9, 1912, did the Brodsky stronghold capitulate, and then only to admit one of the less significant works—a pianoforte and 'cello Sonata, played by Messrs. Carl Fuchs and Cohn. Still, thanks are due for a beginning, however small.

The Brand Lane Orchestral Concerts have started bravely on their way with all the pomp and circumstance of a military review. The entrepreneur knows his public, and as regards the two opening concerts made a great haul. Sir Henry Wood's quite unique experience in directing this type of concert enables him to put forward most tempting programmes. As time goes on, possibly it may be found feasible to introduce music more in accord with the name of the organization—i.e., Brand Lane's Symphony Orchestra.

Nothing particularly distinguished had been done by Balling at the Hallé concerts until the fifth concert was reached, when we got for the first time this season some glimpse of the same masterly qualities displayed by him on the Denhof operatic work. His 'Elijah' reading was novel, but far from convincing.

The opening concert of the Preston Choral Society brought the Melba-Backhaus-Burke-Szigeti party and some singing of choral miniatures much in advance of any previous experience there. Dr. Bairstow only needs a better balance in the male voices to have at hand a thoroughly good choir.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

The programmes of the first three chamber concerts of the season, two given by the Chamber Music Society and one by the Classical Concert Society, could not claim any attention on the score of originality. True, the clarinet and pianoforte recital given by Mr. Charles Draper and Miss Fanny Davies on Friday, October 25, contained Brahms's Sonata in E flat, in which the wind part was superbly played in every respect, but nearly all the pianoforte solo items were of the over-familiar type. The fine Flonzaley Quartet on the following Wednesday, played so beautifully that one longed for some quartet other than the oft-heard and unequal Tchaikovsky in D. The Haydn number selected was not so familiar, but a valuable portion of the evening was wasted over a dull String trio by one of the Martinis. Mr. H. Heyner's songs, too, were mostly old friends; his artistic singing created a very good impression, and he may be sure of a hearty welcome on a return visit. D'Albert signalized a return to the town of his boyhood on November 19 by submitting a programme of the most hackneyed order, the only item not in the popular répertoire of every pianist being his own arrangement of Bach's stupendous Organ Passacaglia, which he played with magnificent breadth.

Gounod's 'Faust,' in concert form, was sung by the Central Hall Choral Society on November 6, under the baton of Councillor Lambert. Dr. Henry Coward gave a breezy and characteristic lecture on November 16 in connection with the Newcastle Centre of the Free Church Musicians' Union. His subject was 'Bach and Handel, their likeness and unlikeness,' and although the lecture and illustrations (vocalists, Miss Cecilia Kemp, Mr. E. J. Potts; violinist, Mr. Alfred Wall; organist and pianist, Mr. H. Y. Dodds; and a body of fifty voices, selected from Free Church choristers who had been trained in Dr. Coward's own choirs), lasted no less than two and a half hours, the personality of the lecturer and the excellence of the performers kept the large audience interested throughout.

The Choir Festival services of Elswick Road Wesleyan Church not only included a performance of the 'Lobgesang' on Sunday, November 17, but Elgar's 'The Kingdom,' which was given by a slightly augmented body of singers on the following Thursday. The calibre of the choir and the excellence of the training of their conductor (Mr. George Dodds) may be judged from the fact that the work was sung with remarkable accuracy throughout, every detail being carefully attended to. The soloists were Mrs. George Dodds, Miss A. Elliot, Mr. E. Kellet, and Mr. V. Jones. The wind and brass parts were skilfully filled in on the organ by the conductor's brother, Mr. H. V. Dodds, and there was a small body of strings.

The first local performance of Elgar's 'The Music Makers' was given the same evening (November 21) by the Sunderland Philharmonic Society, under the baton of Mr. N. Kilburn, at whose suggestion the thoughts of the composer were first turned towards the desirability of a short choral work of this type. The choir was better balanced than formerly, and in spite of some hesitancy and a few flaws, gave a creditable interpretation of Elgar's beautiful ode. Miss Lucy Nuttall sang the solo portion with distinction. Stanford's 'Revenge,' Coleridge-Taylor's Orchestral Ballade in A minor (played In Memoriam), Saint-Saëns's 'Jeunesse d'Hercule,' the 'Meistersinger' Overture, the Andante from Schubert's 'Unfinished Symphony,' and two songs completed the programme. The Leeds Symphony Orchestra was engaged.

NORWICH AND DISTRICT.

A great artistic treat was provided for music-lovers in Norwich on November 14, when Madame Carreño and Herr Backhaus gave a joint pianoforte recital at St. Andrew's Hall. These artists played Mozart's Sonata in D major, Sindings Variations in E flat minor, and Liszt's 'Concerto pathétique' for two pianofortes; and each contributed solos.

That enterprising small body known as the Norwich Chamber Music Society had a concert on the same day at the Theatre Plain Assembly Rooms, Norwich, and gave among other works Mozart's String quintet in G minor, the performers being Mr. von Weeks, Miss Nancy Beeching, Miss M. Egles, Miss Harriet Beeching, and Miss Adeline Carter. Mrs. Carter (pianist) and Mrs. Gurley (Joan Trevalsa) also contributed.

The Saturday Popular Concerts, conducted by Dr. Bunnett, have commenced the Winter season, and among other artists who have appeared are Miss Violet Ludlow, Miss Joan Ashley, Miss Pull, and Miss Wynefred Manby. The attendance has been fairly satisfactory taking into consideration the numerous counter-attractions in the city.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

A successful concert performance of Bizet's 'Carmen' was given by Madame Wilson Moulds, a well-known Nottingham soprano, in the Mechanics' Large Hall, on October 24. The part of Carmen was taken by Madame Wilson Moulds, José by Mr. Philip Ritte, Escamillo by Mr. Charles Keywood, Zuniga by Mr. John Whitehorn, Frasquita by Miss Edith Shipley, Mercédes by Miss Edith Rayson, Micaela by Miss Mabel Clarke, Remendada by Mr. J. Franklin Pearson, and Dancairs by Mr. H. Smith. An orchestra and chorus of 150 members, conducted by Mr. J. S. Derbyshire, ably supported the soloists, and aided in obtaining a very efficient performance.

The Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society opened the current season on October 31 with an excellent performance of Berlioz's 'Faust.' The soloists were Miss Esta D'Argo (Margaret), Mr. Frank Mullings (Faust), and Mr. Robert Burnett (Mephistopheles). The part of Brander was taken by Mr. W. Downing, and that of the Angel by Miss Jennie Bentley. A special word of praise is due to the soloists, but especially to Mr. Burnett and Mr. Mullings who executed their allotted parts brilliantly. The choir overcame their difficult part with unusual ease, and maintained the interest to the last. The orchestra had special opportunities to exhibit their powers in the march and the ballet music, and came out of the ordeal with great credit; the beautiful orchestration gave them an opportunity to come to the front, which they did with credit to themselves and their conductor, Mr. Allen Gill, to whose arduous efforts the success of the performance is largely due.

On November 5 the Long Eaton Orchestral Society, after a lapse of years, resumed its work and gave a successful concert, with Weber's 'Oberon' Overture and Mozart's G minor Symphony included in the programme. The vocalists were Miss Nuttall and Mr. Frank Mullings, who both contributed largely to support the high standard set in the programme. Mr. Mountney, the conductor and moving spirit in the effort to supply the best music to the local public, is to be congratulated on his success.

The lectures at the University College during October deserve notice, mainly because they did not receive the support which they merit. Mrs. Mary Davies opened the series on October 10, taking as her subject 'Welsh folk-song,' and the illustrations were ably sung by Miss Megan Evans and Mr. Powell Edwards. Mr. E. Fannière devoted two lectures to the subject of 'Modern French music,' with illustrations given by Madame Lily Crawforth (vocalist), and Miss Cantelo (pianist). 'The vocal music of Brahms' was the subject of the last lecture, given by Mr. Allen Gill, with Miss Carrie Tubb and a few members of the choir of the Sacred Harmonic Society as performers. It is enough to say that each lecture was delivered by an enthusiast on the subject selected, and that the programmes well enforced the points to which the lecturers drew attention.

[The Competitive Festival held on October 26 is noticed in our supplement, the Competition Festival Record.]

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The late Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' is going the round of the choral Societies. The Sheffield Musical Union gave a beautifully finished performance of the lovable little work on November 14. One of the merits of the cantata is its adaptability to small resources. It sounds very charming, and loses but little of its pathetic sweetness when given with pianoforte accompaniment, as was done in one of the Sheffield suburbs a few months ago. With Dr. Coward's choir and a large orchestra the full colour and expressiveness of the music were secured. The superb power of the choir of nearly 400 almost overwhelmed the fragile delicacy of the Japanese idyll: in the gentler and more poignant aspects of the music, where Dr. Coward's wonderful control of his choir was finely exercised, the effect was better. The choir has rarely sung with a more obvious sense of sympathy. The soloists were Miss Mabel Manson, Miss Cecile Vicars, Mr. Henry Turnpenney, and Mr. Alfred Cunningham. An enthusiastic performance of the chorus 'The night is departing' was the distinctive feature of the 'Hymn of Praise' with which the concert ended. It was a model of balance and well-applied sonority.

The first orchestral Promenade Concert proved a conspicuous success, and promises well for the series—the fourth since their inauguration. An improved and enlarged orchestra, numbering nearly seventy, played with point and sympathy in Strauss's 'Tod und Verklärung.' Fine playing in 'Die Meistersinger' Overture proved that at last a right balance has been secured, and 'L'Arlésienne' Suite, 'Shepherd Fennel's Dance,' and other works were so played as to show the orchestra's versatility of style. Miss Marguerite Melville played the solo part in Saint-Saëns's Pianoforte concerto in G minor with fluent technique and an exquisite touch. Mr. J. A. Rodgers conducted, and Mr. Arthur Catterall was principal first-violin. Miss Lilian Dillingham sang songs by Schumann and Elgar, giving great pleasure by her art.

The 'Hymn of Praise,' is popular as a church cantata in the South Yorkshire district. Following the performance by the Musical Union, two on a smaller scale, with organ, have been given in city churches, with choral assistance from Dr. Coward's choir. That at Oxford Street Church was directed by Councillor Joseph Kaye, and at Brunswick Chapell by Mr. W. A. Hamer.

Amateur opera also flourishes in the city. 'The Gondoliers,' by the Croft Hall Dramatic Society, conducted by Mr. J. Duffell, and 'Don Quixote,' by the Fulwood Musical Society, directed by Mr. A. F. Callum, have been successfully carried out, and Nichols's 'The Holy Grail,' has also been given under the training and direction of Miss Beatrice Beard. Organ recitals by Mr. Edwin H. Lemare and Mr. J. W. Phillips, and a pianoforte recital by M. Paderewski, are also to be recorded in the doings of the past month.

YORKSHIRE.

LEEDS.

The Leeds season, which promises to be an unusually dull one, save perhaps in regard to chamber concerts, began in earnest on October 29, when the first Philharmonic Concert was given. Sir Henry Wood and the Queen's Hall Orchestra, reduced to a little over sixty, took part in a programme which was no doubt wisely arranged in view of the size of the orchestra, but was singular in the absence of any important work by a great master. Saint-Saëns's C minor Symphony, in which organ and pianoforte duet are employed, is an interesting experiment, but not very much more, while the rest of the orchestral programme consisted of snippets, agreeable in their way and most beautifully played, but occupying room which is precious at Leeds, where so few opportunities occur for hearing a first-class orchestra. This concert, and one in which the Hallé Orchestra will appear, in January, seem indeed the only occasions during the present season when an orchestra of the first rank will be heard at Leeds, though in this connection it is satisfactory to be able to record that the 'Municipal' orchestral concerts are to be revived, under Mr. Fricker's conductorship, but no longer under the control or patronage of the Corporation, which has repudiated a concern that cannot 'pay its way,'—let alone 'relieve the rates.' For a similar reason one rather grudged the time taken up at this concert by the Philharmonic chorus, which was heard in three short pieces: Bach's second Sanctus (in D), three movements from Elgar's 'Bavarian Suite', and Balfour Gardiner's spirited 'News from Whydah,'—the last two being given under the conductorship of Mr. Fricker. In chamber music Leeds is making a better show. On October 25, Messrs. Mason and Maude gave the first of their recitals, and played Violin sonatas by Brahms, Schütt, and Grieg, Miss Alys Bateman being the vocalist. On the 30th the Rasch Quartet attracted a good audience to hear Tchaikovsky's String quartet in F, and, with Mr. Percy Richardson as pianist, Brahms's Pianoforte quintet in G minor. Then, on the 13th, the Leeds Bohemian Concerts were resumed, with a fresh personnel consisting of Messrs. Herbert Johnson (pianoforte), Alex Cohen (violin), and A. Hemingway (violoncello). At the first concert, the programme consisted exclusively of Pianoforte trios, by Brahms (C minor), Schubert (B flat, Op. 99), and the 'Fantasiestücke' of Schumann. It will be noticed that Brahms appeared in each of these programmes, but on the principle that 'it never rains but it pours,' a couple of concerts were given on November 18, 19, the programmes of which were devoted entirely to chamber works by Brahms. The 'Edith Robinson Quartet,' with Mr. D. F. Tovey as pianist, and Mr. H. Mortimer as clarinettist, were heard in the three Violin sonatas, the A minor String quartet, the Clarinet quintet and the Pianoforte quintet, along with some of the songs, sung by Miss E. McCullagh and Miss Anderton. The performances reached a high level, and on the whole it may be said that, though a certain lack of variety was inevitable, Brahms came well out of the severe ordeal of a 'one-man exhibition.' The only other Leeds events have been the Musical Evenings organized by Messrs. Haddock, at which, on October 30, Mr. Theodore Byard, an accomplished Lieder singer, gave, with Mr. S. Liddle as his colleague at the pianoforte, a recital which included Schumann's 'Dichterliebe' cycle, while on November 19 a violin recital was given by Miss Lena Kontorovitsch. A concert by some very gifted children, May Ambrose (pianoforte), Stella Ambrose (violin), and Kathleen Ambrose (violoncello), on November 14, should not be passed over without mention.

BRADFORD.

The Bradford Subscription Concerts, which in every respect promise to be of exceptional excellence this season, began on October 18, when Kreisler, Casals, and Max Pauer formed as brilliant a trio of virtuosi as one could wish to hear. Of Schubert's great B flat Trio they gave a performance which was not only brilliant, but sympathetic, and showed a better ensemble than might perhaps have been expected. The second of these concerts, on November 8, was given by Mr. Balling and the Hallé Orchestra, which was heard in an excellent programme, interesting from beginning to end. Dvorák's delightful 'New World' Symphony and Berlioz's 'Benvenuto Cellini' Overture were the familiar pieces. Richard Mandl's brilliant and exuberant 'Gascon tournament' Overture, introduced a short time ago at Manchester, and the early, but powerful, 'Macbeth' tone-poem of Richard Strauss, were both new to Yorkshire. Miss Carrie Tubb gave a fine reading of Isolde's 'Liebestod,' and Mr. Balling secured fine performances that were full of vitality. On November 1 the Festival Choral Society, under Sir Frederic Cowen, gave a concert performance of 'The Flying Dutchman,' a work which, on the whole, lends itself well to this treatment. Mr. Charles Knowles gave a thoughtful reading of the principal part, and Mr. Thorpe Bates was an excellent Daland; Miss Evans Williams as Senta, Mr. Mullings in the tenor parts, and Miss Baxandall as Mary, were efficient, but less happy. The choir was excellent, but the orchestra seemed somewhat over-weighted by its task. On November 6, the Old Choral Society introduced to Bradford Coleridge-Taylor's latest composition, 'A tale of Old Japan,' under the conductorship of Mr. E. J. Pickles, who secured a creditable performance, though the subtleties of the music were hardly realised. Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Amy Houlden, Mr. James Hay, and Mr. Julien Henry (a very capable baritone) were the principals. On this occasion Sullivan's 'In Memoriam' Overture prefaced the concert, by way of tribute to the composer's memory, and, by a coincidence, it occupied the same position at the opening concert of the Bradford Permanent Orchestra on November 9, being then given in memory of the late Mr. S. Fawcett Midgley, one of the bassoons in the Orchestra. Mr. Julian Clifford, who conducted this concert, secured some very brilliant performances, the chief thing in the programme being Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Pianoforte concerto, the solo part in which was played with great force and fire by Mr. Frederick Dawson. Miss Carrie Birkbeck, the vocalist, revived the charming romance, 'Sombre forêt,' from 'Guillaume Tell.'

OTHER TOWNS.

At Huddersfield, the Subscription Concerts have introduced Madame Melba, with Mr. Backhaus as pianist, on October 30; and Madame Carreño, who gave a pianoforte recital on November 19. On October 15, the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society, which is now under the direction of Mr. C. H. Moody, of Ripon, began a fresh season with a programme that included some fine old madrigals by Byrd and Palestrina, which were very well sung—better, indeed, than modern pieces by Bantock and Boughton, or than their share in Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet,' the solo part in which was ably sung by Mr. Charles Tree. Miss Miriam Timothy played some interesting harp solos in highly artistic style. On October 19, the Huddersfield Philharmonic gave its first concert this season, Mr. Ibeson conducting a programme which included three of Wagner's Overtures and a 'Selection.' Miss Lottie Beaumont, the vocalist, displayed a mezzo-soprano voice of quite unusual beauty, and Mr. J. Eagleton, jun., showed considerable dexterity in a saxophone solo. On November 8, the Huddersfield Choral Society gave Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' of which a good deal seems likely to be heard during this season. With Miss Esta d'Argo, Miss Maud Wright, Messrs. d'Oisly and Borwell as soloists, and Dr. Coward as conductor, a sympathetic and effective performance of the cantata was given.

The Halifax Orchestral Society introduced at its first concert, on October 31, the charming 'Jena' Symphony, which is very plausibly attributed to Beethoven; and, indeed, it is not easy to mention another name that meets all the conditions of the case so well. Mr. H. van Dyk conducted, and Miss Doris Elliott and Mr. Ward Kempe were the vocalists. On November 1, the first of the Halifax Chamber Concerts took place, the Rawdon Briggs Quartet introducing a novelty in the shape of a String quartet by a Danish composer, Stenhammar, of which report speaks favourably.

The Wakefield Choral Society, on October 3, gave Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'Death of Minnehaha,' under Mr. Percy Bligh's direction. Miss Maude Ward and Messrs. Wilfrid Hudson and Robert Charlesworth were the soloists in a generally creditable performance, which, like two others noticed above, began with the 'In Memoriam' Overture, introduced here as a memorial of the composer. On November 15, the Wakefield Chamber Concert introduced the 'Manchester Trio'—Messrs. Catterall (violin), Fuchs (violoncello), and Isaacs (pianoforte)—who played Pianoforte trios by Brahms (C minor) and Schubert (E flat, Op. 100) in thoroughly artistic style.

The Hull Harmonic Society, of which Mr. Walter Porter is conductor, gave an excellent performance of 'The Golden Legend' on November 8, with Madame Gleeson-White, Elsie Bradley, F. Mullings, and F. Ranalow as soloists. On the 19th, the Hull Vocal Society, under Dr. G. H. Smith, followed with a programme of unaccompanied part-music, songs being contributed by Miss Alice Lakin and pianoforte solos by Mr. Julian Clifford. The York Symphony Orchestra's concert, on November 4, introduced as its chief feature Beethoven's fourth Pianoforte concerto, of which, with Miss Fanny Davies as soloist, a highly sympathetic performance was given. Mr. T. Tertius Noble conducted. At the Malton Subscription Concert, on October 28, Mr. Herbert Withers and Mrs. Withers played some interesting music for violoncello and pianoforte, including Beethoven's Sonata in C (Op. 102, No. 2), and a modern 'Sonata in one movement' by Huré. The Hon. Stuart Pleydell-Bouverie was the vocalist.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

Berkhamsted.—On October 31, a concert was given by the Berkhamsted Orchestral Society with the aid of additional wind players from London. The orchestra, numbering thirty-nine players, was quite successful with its attempted programme, which included Mozart's 'Figaro' Overture and Pianoforte concerto in C, Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite, No. 1, and Beethoven's Symphony in C minor (first two movements). Mr. Harold Wood played the solo part in the Concerto, and Miss Olive Easton appeared as vocalist. Miss Siegfried led the orchestra, while the conductor's post was occupied by Mr. J. T. Bavin.——A pianoforte recital was given by Mr. Harold Wood at the school (where he had previously studied under Mr. Bavin) on November 2.——On November 9, Messrs. Pecskai (violin) and Lebell (violoncello), and Dr. Markham Lee (pianoforte), gave a chamber concert, assisted by Mr. Hawdon as vocalist.

Blaydon.—T. Mee Pattison's setting of 'The ancient mariner' formed the chief work in the programme of a concert given by the Blaydon Wesleyan Church Choir on November 13. It presented no difficulties to the choir, and was sung effectively. The only other choral number was a Fantasia on 'Tannhäuser.' The soloists of the occasion were Madame Mabel Herbert, Mrs. J. E. Jordan, Mr. J. E. Jordan, and Mr. Stuart McIntosh.

CARLISLE.—The second Symphony Concert took place on November 7, under the conductorship of the Cathedral organist, Mr. F. W. Wadely. The programme included Mozart's E flat Symphony, Mendelssohn's 'Hebrides' Overture, Stanford's 'Last post,' 'Hail, bright abode,' from Wagner's 'Tannhäuser,' and the 'Preislied' from 'Die Meistersinger,' sung by Mr. Gwynne Davies. Orchestra and choir numbered about 170.

CHATHAM.—A 'Matinée musicale' was given at Chatham on November 4 by the band of the First Division Royal Marines, under the direction of Mr. Charles Hoby. The programme was of exceptional interest. Besides Mozart's 'Figaro' Overture and Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennel's Dance,' it included movements from Svendsen's Symphony in D (Op. 4), a Menuet by Aléxéyeff, Grieg's Suite, 'Sigurd Jorsalfar,' and a Suite from a Russian ballet by Luigini (Op. 23).

DUNEDIN (N.Z.).—The ninety-ninth concert of the Liedertafel took place on September 18, under the direction of the hon. conductor, Mr. Jesse Timson. The feature of the concert was a performance of 'The fallen heroes' (Jenkins), with Mr. E. H. Eagar as tenor soloist. The other soloists were Miss Sadie Broad and Mr. F. H. Taylor (vocalists), Mr. Frank Drake (violoncello), and Mr. G. Dick (flautist). For the hundredth concert, on December 3, Félicien David's 'The Desert' is in preparation.

EBBW VALE (SOUTH WALES).—The musical Festival, under the auspices of the Monmouth English Musical Festival Association, was held at the Congregational Church on October 28. The choir of 450 voices, trained by Mr. Tom Davies, gave excellent performances, especially of 'How lovely are the messengers' (Mendelssohn) and the 'Hallelujah' chorus (Handel). The organists were Miss Hannah Jones and Madame Tuck, and the conductor was Dr. Caradog Roberts, who also in the afternoon and evening meetings contributed solos on the organ.

HANLEY.—A quite exceptional performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf' was given by the Hanley Glee and Madrigal Society, under the direction of Mr. John James, at the Victoria Hall, on October 31. In its choral aspects the performance could hardly have been bettered, and the orchestral forces brought together for the occasion gave adequate support. The soloists of the concert were Madame Annie Walker, Mr. Joseph Cheetham, and Mr. Charles Tree. Mr. Ernest Hammond was at the organ. It was a slur upon the musical reputation of the neighbourhood that the audience was comparatively small.

HEBDEN BRIDGE.—The Hebden Bridge Choral and Harmonic Society opened its season on November 12 with an excellent performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' Parts I. and III. The choir, directed by Dr. W. Williams, sang with good quality of tone and abundant spirit, and their work aroused considerable enthusiasm. The solo singers were Miss Dorothy Silk, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. George Parker, all of whom also contributed to the miscellaneous section of the programme.

KIMBERLEY (S.A.).—Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was performed on October 15 for the first time in South Africa, by the Diamond Fields Musical Society. The choir answered the technical and expressive demands of the work without fail under the guidance of Mr. A. H. Ashworth. The soloists were Madame Mazery, Mrs. Ashworth, Mr. W. Everard, and Mr. A. Milden. The choir was also heard in the funeral chorus from 'The death of Minnehaha,' Faning's 'Moonlight' and in 'The march triumphal thunders,' from 'Caractacus.' The orchestra was assisted at the organ by Mr. M. G. Hart.

LEAMINGTON.—A 'Concert for young people of school age' was given at Queen's Hall on November 1, with the Misses Salter (vocal duettists) and Mr. Peter McGregor (pianist) as artists. The programme was well devised, and explanatory remarks were supplied by Professor Niecks.

LINCOLN.—A popular concert was given by the Orchestral Society, at the Central Hall, on November 6, under the direction of the Rev. C. H. Scott. Sibelius's 'Finlandia,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'Four characteristic waltzes,' and Grieg's Pianoforte concerto, with Miss Lucy Polgreen as soloist, were the chief features. Songs were given by Miss Phyllis Lett.

PENZANCE.—Mr. S. W. Alfred Moyle, one of the leading English 'cellists, gave a recital in St. John's Hall. His playing revealed his mastery of the instrument. He was selected to represent England as soloist at the Empire Concerts, Crystal Palace.

PERTH (W.A.).—The concert-version of German's 'Merrie England' was performed by the Philharmonic Society on September 14, at His Majesty's Theatre, and on September 28, at the Government House Ball-room, in aid of the Charity Organization Society. On both occasions Mr. Herbert C. Goff conducted, and the principal parts were taken by Miss Minnie Waugh, Mrs. A. Flight Smith, Miss Gertie Ottaway, Mr. P. Bindley, and Mr. S. F. Pick. Unbounded pleasure was given to the listeners, among whom on the second occasion was the Governor, Sir Gerald Strickland.

SOUTHAMPTON.—Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was the principal feature of an excellent programme presented by the Test Valley Musical Society. The choral singing, under Mr. E. H. Moberly's direction, maintained a high standard in every respect, and admirable work was done by the four soloists, Miss Margaret Layton, Miss Hilda Cragg-James, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Harold Dupre. An orchestra accompanied efficiently, and gave separate contributions that included a Symphony in B flat by Haydn and Mozart's 'Figaro' Overture. The choir was also heard separately in part-songs.

SOUTHSEA.—A concert in aid of the funds of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, Victoria Road, was given at the schoolroom on November 6, by the choir, which has been brought to a high state of efficiency by Mr. W. J. Groves, the choirmaster. Bennett's 'The May Queen' was excellently performed, and an entertaining miscellaneous programme was provided in addition. The principal artists were Mrs. G. Howlett, Mrs. H. Watts, Mr. Gordon Bailey, and Mr. Walford Lovatt.

SPILSBY.—'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'Blest Pair of Sirens' were the chief works in the programme of a concert given at the Drill Hall, on October 29. The former was conducted by Miss Lushington and the latter by Mr. Massingberd. The choral singing was in both cases distinguished by its spirit and good tone. The separate contributions of the orchestra included Hérold's 'Zampa' Overture (conducted by Dr. Burgess), and the 'Peer Gynt' Suite. The soloists were Miss Talbot and Mr. Geoffrey Stephenson (vocalists) and Miss Lushington (violinist).

STOKE-ON-TRENT.—The principal feature of a concert given at King's Hall, on October 24, by the North Staffordshire Orchestra, under Mr. John Cope, was the performance of the 'March,' 'Hymn' and 'Carnival' from Mr. Havergal Brian's 'English Suite.' Its clever and vivid music description of a Wakes was well portrayed by the orchestra. Other numbers in the programme were Beethoven's third 'Leonora' Overture, the 'Tannhäuser' Overture, Grieg's Pianoforte concerto (with Miss Tina Lerner as soloist), and vocal contributions by Mr. J. Campbell McInnes.

STOURBRIDGE.—A finely considered and technically admirable performance of Gade's 'The Crusaders' was given by the Stourbridge Concert Society on November 4, under the direction of Mr. George Halford. The singing of the choir was worthy of the choral prestige of Stourbridge, and the work of the soloists—Miss Alice Hare, Mr. Frederick Thomas and Mr. Farrington—reached an appropriate standard. Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony made an excellent companion work to Gade's melodious cantata.

SWANSEA.—The Swansea and District Male-Voice Choir, victors at the recent National Eisteddfod, gave a complimentary concert to their conductor, Mr. L. R. Bowen, on October 24. The programme included Cyril Jenkins's 'Deep Jordan's banks,' Bantock's 'The glories of our blood and State,' Dr. Vaughan Thomas's 'The lost love,' Saint-Saëns's 'To aviators,' and Cook's 'Strike the lyre.' Solos were given by Miss Lottie Thomas, Mr. D. Bodycombe, and Mr. John Thomas (vocalists), and Mr. T. Ivor Owen (pianist).

WATFORD.—An interesting concert was given at the School of Music on October 23, by Mr. Victor Duane's Orchestras, junior and senior. The contributions of the latter included a Concerto Grosso in G minor, by Handel, Beethoven's third Pianoforte concerto, with Mr. Frederick Pratt as soloist, and two movements of Beethoven's first Symphony. Other soloists were Miss Gertrude Cass (vocalist), Miss Eileen Duane (violoncellist), and Mr. Victor Duane (violinist).

Foreign Notes.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

Several interesting works, including Richard Strauss's tone-poem 'Don Quixote,' Mahler's second Symphony, the D minor Symphony by César Franck, and a Suite, 'Piemonte,' by Sinigaglia, have been performed at the Municipal Symphony Concerts (conductor, Herr Fritz Busch).

ANGERS.

Vincent d'Indy's 'Wallenstein' Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Fantaisie Russe' for violin and orchestra were played at the first Concert Populaire (conductor, M. Jean Gay).

ANTWERP.

On October 31 a new opera, 'Lorenzo Murano,' composed by Edouard Potjès to the libretto by Gustave Toudouze, was succcessfully produced at the Flemish Theatre. Other interesting features of the season have been the first performance of the opera 'Les Templiers' by the once-famous composer and pianist Henry Litolff, and the revival of M. Oscar Roel's 'Pinksternacht. On the latter occasion the dramatic legend 'La mort du roi Reynaud,' by Louis Delune, was produced, and proved of considerable interest.——The programme of the first Concert Populaire included the Flemish dances by Jan Blockx and an orchestral piece, 'Hommage à Conscience,' by H. Willems.——The Société de Zoologie inaugurated the season with a concert devoted to less familiar works by Saint-Saëns, the programme including the 'March héroïque,' 'La Nuit,' for soprano solo, female chorus, and orchestra, 'Chanson d'Ancêtre,' for baritone solo, male chorus, and orchestra, and the ode 'La lyre et le la harpe,' for solo voices, mixed chorus, and orchestra.——At the Theatre Royal, Saint-Saëns's opera 'L'Ancêtre' and Debussy's 'L'enfant prodigue' have been given for the first time with great success. Dr. Saint-Saëns, who witnessed the performance, was accorded a great ovation. —— The Flemish Opera recently revived Jan Blockx's 'La fiancée de la mer.'

AUGSBURG.

Gabriel Pierné's oratorio 'François d'Assises' has been given for the first time in Germany. It is an interesting work, and was well received.

BERLIN.

Gustav Mahler's Symphony 'Das Lied von der Erde' has been given for the first time in Berlin at a concert conducted by Herr Oscar Fried. The work is not a symphony in the traditional sense of the word, but a cycle of six songs to old Chinese words, with orchestra. Though it is not a conspicuous example of Mahler's best work, it contains pages of great interest and originality.——Haydn's symphony 'La Reine' and Mozart's rarely-heard Pianoforte concerto in D major ('Krönungs-Concert'), excellently played by Herr Waldemar Lütschg, were performed at the first concert of the Königliche-Kapelle (conductor, Dr. Richard Strauss).——Bantock's 'Sappho' Prologue was recently played at a concert of the 'Neue Berliner Tonkünstlerinnen Orchester.'——Richard Strauss's rarely-heard Violin concerto figured in the programme of a concert given by Fräulein Schuster-Woldau.——The Berliner Mozart Gemeinde gave a fine performance of Mozart's great Mass in C minor.——Handel's oratorio 'Deborah' was given at a concert of the Singakademie (conductor, Professor Georg Schumann).——An interesting orchestral Suite by Dohnànyi was played at a concert conducted by Herr Theodore Spiering.——Cyril Scott's 'Aubade' for orchestra was performed for the first time at the second Symphony Concert of the Blüthner Orchestra (conductor, Herr Siegmund von Hausegger).——An interesting String quartet by Felix Draeseke and a Divertimento by Joseph Haas were recently brought forward by the Petri Quartet.——The Sevcik Quartet revived Saint-Saëns's rarely-heard (and only) String quartet at their first concert.——Sibelius's 'Der Ursprung des Feuers,' for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra, Bruckner's 'Mitternacht,' and Hugo Kaun's 'Zigeunertreiben,' were performed for the first time at a concert given by the Berliner Liedertafel.——Auber's opera 'Masaniello' has been revived at the Royal Opera.——Richard Mandl's overture 'Zu einem Gascognischen Ritterspiel' and Smetana's symphonic-poem 'Vysehrad' were included in the programme of the second Philharmonic Concert (conductor, Herr Arthur Nikisch).

BREMEN.

Wolf-Ferrari's opera 'Der Schmuck der Madonna' was recently given for the first time at the Municipal Theatre.

BRESLAU.

Paul von Klenau's ballad 'Ebbe Skammelsen,' for baritone and orchestra (soloist, Herr Anton von Rooy), and 'In a summer garden,' by Frederic Delius, were performed for the first time at the first concert of the Breslauer Chor Verein (conductor, Professor Dohrn).

BRUNSWICK.

The feature of the first Symphony Concert of the Court Orchestra was a fine performance of Liszt's symphonic-poem 'Ce q'on entend sur la montagne,' given under the conductorship of Herr Richard Hagel.

BRUSSELS.

Lalo's charming opera 'Le Roi d'Ys' and Beethoven's 'Fidelio' were lately revived with great success at the Théâtre Royale de la Monnaie.——On October 25 the first performance in French of Humperdinck's 'Die Königskinder' (Les Enfants-Rois) took place at the same theatre under the direction of Herr Otto Lohse.——César Franck's Symphony in D minor, Paul Dukas's Scherzo 'L'Apprenti Sorcier,' and Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Schéhérazade' were included in the programme of the first Concert Populaire, conducted by M. Sechiari.——The first Concert Ysaye was devoted to works by Mozart, including the sublime 'Requiem.'

BUENOS AYRES.

Massenet's 'Werther,' with Signor Anselmi in the title-part, has been given with great success at the Colon Theatre.

COLOGNE.

A performance of Richard Strauss's 'Elektra' has been one of the most interesting features of the opera season.—— A new work by Weingartner, entitled 'Eine lustige Ouverture,' was produced, under the composer's direction, at the first Gürzenich Concert. The programme also included Reger's Romantische Suite and Handel's second Coronation Hymn, both given for the first time at these concerts. At the second concert a Violin concerto by Julius Weissmann was produced.

DARMSTADT.

Tinel's oratorio 'Franciscus' was performed at the first concert of the Musikverein on October 21.

DUSSELDORF.

Under the direction of Professor Karl Panzner, Richard Strauss's early Symphony in F minor, Op. 12, and a new Pianoforte concerto by Max Anton, were played at the first Symphony Concert.

ELBERFELD.

A concert performance of Peter Cornelius's delightful comic opera 'Der Barbier von Bagdad' formed the programme of the first concert of the Elberfelder Konzertgesellschaft (conductor, Dr. Hans Haym).

ESSEN.

Many rarely-heard works have been played at the concerts of the Musikverein and those of the Municipal Orchestra (both series conducted by Herr Hermann Abendroth). Most interest was aroused by Hausegger's 'Natursymphonie' (with chorus), a Violin concerto by Bleyle, August Scharrer's 'Symphonic Overture,' and the Prelude and Intermezzo from Hugo Wolf's opera 'Der Korregidor.'

FRANKFURT.

This city is musically in a state of war owing to the severe criticisms that the Frankfurter Zeitung has been passing upon the conductor of the Museumsgesellschaft Concerts. The subscribers having demonstrated against the newspaper, the state of affairs at the time of writing is that no doings of the Museumsgesellschaft are mentioned in any paper belonging to the official association of German newspapers.

HAMBURG.

Max Reger's 'Concerto in the olden style' was performed for the first time (under the composer's direction) at the second concert of the Philharmonische Gesellschaft. The programme of the third concert contained the 'Marsch der heiligen drei Könige,' from the oratorio 'Christus' by Liszt, Glazounoff's Violin concerto in A minor, and Alexander Ritter's symphonic-poem 'Kaiser Rudolf's Ritt zum Grabe.'——At his first orchestral concert Professor Francesco Paolo Neglia produced his 'Sinfonia Italo-Tedesca.'——Caruso appeared at the Opera House with great success in 'Carmen,' 'Aïda,' and 'La Traviata.'

HEIDELBERG.

Bernhard Sekles's Suite for Orchestra (Op. 21) was successfully performed under the composer's direction for the first time at the first concert of the Bachverein.

KARLSRUHE.

Under the conductorship of Herr Leopold Reichwein, Puccini's opera 'La Tosca' was lately played for the first time at the Court Theatre.

LEIPSIC.

Under the direction of Herr Otto Lohse, Hans Pfitzner's interesting opera 'Die Rose vom Liebesgarten' was given for the first time at the Neues Theater with considerable success.——Mahler's fourth Symphony, Walter Braunfels's Overture to E. J. A. Hoffmann's 'Prinzessin Brambilla,' and Reinecke's beautiful Prelude to the fifth Act of 'König Manfred' (perhaps his best composition) were performed at the third Gewandhaus concert, under the direction of Herr Nikisch.——French music figured largely in the programme of the first Philharmonic Concert. Homage was done to the memory of Massenet with performances of his Overture to Racine's 'Phèdre' and the Ballet suite 'Le Cid.'——Ignaz Brüll's opera 'Das goldene Kreuz' has been revived at the Neues Theater. It was preceded by the first performances of the ballet 'Les petits riens,' with music by Mozart (written in 1778 for the Paris Grand Opéra).

LYONS.

The season at the Grand Theatre commenced with a successful revival of Reyer's opera 'Salammbo.'——At the Symphony Concerts conducted by M. Witkowski the following compositions will be heard for the first time: Richard Strauss's 'Symphonia domestica,' the third Symphony by Gédalge, 'Jour d'été à la montagne' by Vincent d'Indy, Debussy's 'Iberia,' the prelude to 'Pays,' by Guy Ropartz, and Bruneau's 'Penthésilée.'

MILAN.

The Teatro Lirico inaugurated its season with the production of a new opera, 'Cingallegra,' by Sepolli. A A little later, Orefice's 'Rahda' was given for the first time.——The Teatra dal Verme has given Wagner's 'Die Walküre.'

MÜNSTER.

At the first concert of the Musikverein, on October 11, Max Reger conducted his Serenade in G major, Op. 95.——Herr Heinrich Zoellner directed a performance of his Symphony in F major at the second concert. On the same occasion, Brahms's 13th Psalm, for female chorus, and an interesting Violin concerto, by Désiré Thomassin, were heard.

NANTES.

A new opera, 'Myrialde,' composed to his own libretto by Léon Moreau, was successfully produced at the Grand Theatre on November 9.

NEW YORK.

The novelties and revivals promised at the Metropolitan Opera House include Walter Damrosch's 'Cyrano de Bergerac,' Boito's 'Mefistofele,' 'Le Chemineau,' by Xavier Leroux, Mascagni's 'Iris,' and Wolf-Ferrari's 'Il segreto di Susanna.'

PARIS.

Massenet's Suite, 'Esclarmonde,' and his Pianoforte concerto (soloist, M. Louis Diémer), and Florent Schmitt's 'La tragédie de Salomé,' were heard at the first Lamoureux Concert.——On October 30 a ballet, 'La Bacchantes,' with interesting music by M. Alfred Bruneau, was produced at the Grand Opéra.——'La Danseuse de Pompéi,' the new opera-ballet by Jean Nougués, was produced on October 29 at the Opéra-Comique, with great success.——Gabriel Fauré's Ballade for pianoforte and orchestra, a symphonic piece, 'Vers la Princesse lointaine,' by Canteloube, and César Franck's symphonic-poem, 'Le chasseur maudit,' were performed at the Colonne Concert on October 27. On the same day Glazounoff's fantasy for orchestra, 'La Mer,' and Prélude and Danses from Mariottes's 'Salomé,' were given at the Lamoureux Concert.——M. Gustave Charpentier has been elected for the seat in the Academy left vacant by the death of M. Massenet. In celebration of this event, M. Gabriel Pierné (who was himself a candidate for this honour) performed his beautiful Suite, 'Impressions d'Italie,' at the Colonne Concert on November 3.——Paul Dukas's Symphony in C major was played at the Lamoureux Concert given on the same date. The programme also included Bach's 'Sinfonia' for the Easter celebrations, Handel's Concerto for two oboes and string orchestra, and Mozart's rarely-heard 'Linzer' Symphony (No. 36).——Chabrier's 'Gwendoline' and Saint-Saëns's 'Déjanire' have been revived at the Grand Opéra.

PHILADELPHIA.

Massenet's 'Cendrillon,' with Miss Maggie Teyte in the principal part, was recently given at the Opera House.

VIENNA.

A new Violin concerto by Weingartner has been produced under the composer's direction at a Philharmonic Concert. Herr Fritz Kreisler, to whom the work is dedicated, played the solo part in masterly style. The work obtained a great success, and both composer and soloist were accorded enthusiastic ovations.

Miscellaneous.

The London Sunday School Choir (founded in 1871) will hold its Spring Musical Festival at the Royal Albert Hall, South Kensington, on Saturday, February 22, 1913, and its next Great Crystal Palace Festival on Wednesday, June 18, 1913. Miss Ruth Vincent and Mr. Robert Radford have been engaged as soloists at the Royal Albert Hall Festival; there will be a full orchestra, and Mr. H. L. Balfour will give organ solos on the great organ.

The Loughton Choral Society and Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Henry Riding, have chosen Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul,' Vaughan Williams's 'Fantasia on Christmas Carols,' and the concert-version of Planquette's 'Les Cloches de Corneville' as their programme for the season.

The Enniscorthy Choral Union has commenced its Winter session under the conductorship of Mr. E. Challans, organist and choirmaster of St. Mary's. The works selected for practice are T. Mee Pattison's 'The shepherd's holiday' and Percy Fletcher's Choral Fantasia on 'Lohengrin.'

Mr. Percy A. Scholes, editor of The Music Student, has been appointed a University Extension Lecturer of Oxford University.

During the year that ended on September 30, the Hallé Orchestra Pension Fund was increased by £554 4*s.* 5*d.* to £8,577 11*s.* 0*d.*

Answers to Correspondents.

G. M. P.—The resemblance of 'The gentle maiden' to 'The boys of Wexford' is not accidental. As a matter of fact the tune called by Bunting 'The gentle maiden' is a version of 'The boys of Wexford,' effected by merely a change of rhythm from ¢ time to 8. 'The boys of Wexford' is the modern title of 'Roisin dubh,' an Irish song of about the year 1600. In 1770, a variant of it appeared as set to 'My lodging is on the cold ground'—printed as an Irish song in 1778, and again in 1783. It was cribbed by the Scotch as 'I loe ne a laddie but ane,' and published under that title in 1779. Bunting's version only appeared in 1840. 'The little Red Lark' is also a variant of 'Roisin dubh' or 'The boys of Wexford.'

G. F. A. (Halifax).—The following list probably contains what you require: 'Hymn of faith,' by Ivor Atkins; 'Blessed are they who watch,' Advent cantata, by Hugh Blair; 'A song of victory,' by Hiller; Psalm, 'By the waters of Babylon,' by Oliver King; 'A harvest song,' by Lee Williams. We might add Schubert's 'Song of Miriam' and Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer.' All can be obtained from Messrs. Novello.

ATALANTA.—No physical injury can be caused by clarinet playing. The instrument is not adapted for self-tuition. The only separate treatise on the history of oratorio that we know is Dr. Ernest Walker's article in 'Grove's Dictionary.'

TENOR.—Dr. Ritter's 'Musical dictation,' two vols. (Novello's Primers, Nos. 29 and 30, prices 1*s.* and 2*s.*), would suit both your purposes.

SCOTIA.—The pedal may be used as long as it is changed for every new chord. About ♩. = 72.

REMARKABLE WORK ON MUSIC EDUCATION.
WRITTEN BY FAMOUS EXPERTS.

THAT Wonderful Book, the MUSICAL EDUCATOR, seems this season to be entering upon a new lease of life. As our readers know, its aim is to supply in interesting form a complete and systematic musical education.

We would especially draw attention to the following names of Leaders in the Musical World, and of the subjects for which they are responsible. The practical value of these sections will be apparent to all students and professors of music and singing.

PADEREWSKI,
"On the best way to study the Piano."
MARK HAMBOURG,
"The Piano and how to Play it."
CARUSO,
"On the cultivation of the voice."
CLARA BUTT,
"On how to sing a song."
EDWIN H. LEMARE,
"The Art of Organ Playing."
MADAME MARCHESI,
"The Teaching of Singing."
JOHN DUNN,
"On Playing the Violin."
SIR F. H. COWEN,
"The Art of Conducting."

Course of Voice Training, Singing, and Solfeggio. Course on the Pianoforte. Course on the Violin. Positions illustrated by Diagrams and Photographs. Course on Harmonium, American Organ, and on the Organ. Lessons on Scientific Basis of Music. Lessons on Rudiments of Music. Course on Harmony and Counterpoint. Lessons in Canon and Fugue. Lessons in Musical Forms, Musical Analysis and Composition. Dictionary of Musical Terms. Articles on the Instruments used in the Orchestras and in Military Bands. History of Music. Biographical Dictionary of Musicians. Articles on Children's Music and Musical Drill. Articles on Choir Training and Conducting. Article on Congregational Music. Article on Musical Degrees and Education. Article on Nationality in Music.

ITS VALUE TO THE TEACHER.

In "The Musical Educator" every section is dealt with by an expert. Its value to the teacher of music is obvious, because it shows the way—at once simple and lucid—in which some of the greatest of musical professors would set about the instruction of a pupil anxious to perfect himself in his particular department, whether it be that of the piano, the violin, the harp, or any other instrument, or of any department of singing.

Add to this its all-round value as a standard work of reference on every point concerning the wide domain of music and musicians, and it will be granted that "The Musical Educator" is unique as well as complete.

TWO OPINIONS.

Sir J. FREDERICK BRIDGE.
"'The Musical Educator' is full of useful information plainly set forth. The musical illustrations are excellent."

Dr. CRESER, Mus.D. Oxon, F.R.C.O., F.T.C.L. (Examiner in Music at Trinity College), writes :—
"We have here an illuminative work of great value, not only to the student, but also to the general reader. . . . It contains excellent instructions."

MUSIC MAKERS

ODE

BY

ARTHUR O'SHAUGHNESSY

SET TO MUSIC

FOR CONTRALTO SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

EDWARD ELGAR

(OP. 69).

Price Two Shillings and Sixpence.

Paper Boards, 3s.; Cloth, 4s.; Vocal Parts, 1s. each; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s. 6d.

THE TIMES.

It is a setting of the Ode by Arthur O'Shaughnessy beginning "We are the music makers, and we are the dreamers of dreams," which extols the artist spirit as the motive power of human action. The words are of a kind to appeal strongly to such a mind as Elgar's and to bring from him music which makes a very direct appeal to the sympathy of his audience. The personal interpretation of the words given by the frequent quotations from his own earlier works no doubt heightens this appeal at the moment, and serves to secure an immediate acceptance for the work.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The music is often of exquisite beauty, . . . the Ode represents Elgar in the highest development of his creative faculty.

MORNING POST.

To illustrate the story of those who have inspired the music the composer draws from his own works, his quotations from himself being made with considerable subtlety. As in the case of a play founded upon a novel, it is necessary to know the original to appreciate its application, but as Elgar's music is now well known there is no difficulty on the part of the hearers. . . . The use made of familiar themes is happy, but nowhere is it so successfully made as at that portion where the soloist enters to describe the ignorance of the singers as to the effect of their work. Here the theme of the Nimrod number from the Enigma Variations is used, and, as reinforced by the chorus, the effect is very striking. Though using recognisable matter, the composer employs it in the best manner, and he works this section up to a mighty climax.

DAILY NEWS.

The whole is full of characteristic Elgarian beauty and ample contrasts. It is more easily intelligible at a first hearing than any of his important recent works, and its instant popularity would seem to be assured.

DAILY EXPRESS.

There is not a great deal of music, melodically speaking, in the swing of the lines, and after writing one wholly beautiful theme—a theme that is constantly recurring, if never with quite the same alluring appeal as when it is first heard in the orchestra—the composer continues on his way with a wealth of harmonic colour and forceful rhetoric.

DAILY MAIL.

"The Music Makers," Sir Edward Elgar's new choral ode, touches none of the depths of the composer's really memorable achievements excepting by the way of direct quotation. Yet it deserves, and will win, popular favour and many performances because of its fluent grace and beautifully accomplished workmanship.

Sir Edward Elgar is nowadays in the completest possession of his style of technical accomplishments. He can compose those glowing Elgarian harmonies, that rich orchestral colouring, whether he has or has not a considerable motive behind, just as Bach wrote counterpoint.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

The brief prelude is full of that mystic atmosphere which Elgar knows so well how to produce, and the hushed entry of the chorus in some simple phrases is also very exquisite in effect. Then I think the music flags just a little until we come to a passage where the chorus sings (in ancient mode) of Nineveh, and the orchestra has a fine theme of swinging rhythm, suggesting an irresistible onward force.

Some of the finest music in the work begins with the entry of a contralto solo, "They had no vision amazing," sung to phrases of much imagination. . . . A fine climax, picturing "the infinite morning," is fashioned out of the big theme of the first Symphony, and soon the contralto voice enters again with a long solo of great emotional power and beauty. The ending brings once more the hushed mystic atmosphere with which the work opened.

FIFINE AT THE FAIR

(A DEFENCE OF INCONSTANCY).

AN ORCHESTRAL DRAMA

WITH A PROLOGUE

(AFTER BROWNING).

COMPOSED BY

GRANVILLE BANTOCK.

MINIATURE SCORE.

Price Five Shillings. Cloth, 7s. 6d.

Orchestral Parts, MS.

THE TIMES.

It is indeed a remarkably brilliant piece of work of its kind, and is one which it is easy to appreciate. . . . We have first a delicate prologue for strings which directly pictures the sensations described in Browning's "Amphibian," then a delightfully humorous scene of the Fair, then music intended to contrast the characters of Fifine and Elvire. . . . He never seems at a loss for a moment, and if his drama is apt to call up recollections of modern Italian opera, all the devices serve him well, because they convey certain ideas in a direct way to his audience.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Superbly put together, and invented and scored by a truly masterly hand, Bantock has not given us for many days a work so likely to bring worshippers to the shrine of his great and here genial talent.

STANDARD.

Mr. Granville Bantock's musical counterpart to Browning's "Fifine at the Fair" is quite the best thing that he has given us. He is never at a loss for a happy phrase, never nonplussed for want of right shade of colour. His music is realistic—splendidly and convincingly so in the Fair scene—objective and subjective; picturesque, sensuous and strong. In the more introspective passages his instruments moralise with singular eloquence. The clash of emotion—there is no need to dwell upon the cause, since Browning is an open book to all—is handled with masterly effect. . . It is delightful music, and good hearing from beginning to end.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

Mr. Bantock's orchestral drama, "Fifine at the Fair," is a brilliant contribution to English orchestral literature, original and modern in its ideas and masterly in its orchestral treatment of these. The music is founded upon Browning's poem of the same name, and is divided into a prologue, drama, and epilogue (as in the poem). The first section has given Mr. Bantock an opportunity for his fine powers of musical characterization, and the themes illustrating the nature of the three protagonists (Fifine, the Man, and his wife, Gloire) are very expressive and cleverly handled. The drama opens with a clever tone-picture of the Fair, which is almost one of the best things in the work, this being followed by a "Fifine portrait" of much cleverness. The epilogue music perhaps attracts one more by its cleverness than its inspiration, but here, too, the composer has written some pages glowing with a fine emotion and of much dramatic power.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Mr. Granville Bantock's orchestral drama, "Fifine,' is a very brilliant and spirited piece of work, and in many ways stronger than any other work of the same class by Bantock.

YORKSHIRE POST.

No living musician has a greater power of orchestral expression, and his poetic fancy is inexhaustible. Never has it been employed on a more charming subject or with better effect than in this case. He has produced a work which will compare with the symphonic-poems of Strauss, and will be regarded by most people as more uniformly musical. It is not going too far to style it a masterly work, and entirely successful. It gives us the composer's own impressions of the drama it illustrates in absolutely musical terms. It glows with colour; it is brilliant, atmospheric, passionate, in turn; and it is also thoroughly spontaneous and unaffected.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

In his orchestral drama, "Fifine at the Fair," Professor Granville Bantock has far surpassed all his previous achievements in orchestral music, and attempts not without success the scope of Strauss.

OBSERVER.

Professor Granville Bantock's "Fifine at the Fair," which is inspired by Browning's poem, is, taken as a whole, perhaps the strongest and best-proportioned of all the composer's symphonic works, and the fullest of real feeling, while the themes are the most expressive he has given us. . . . The way in which they are used, so as to represent the interplay of forces between the three chief characters, and the genuine power and beauty of much of the orchestral writing, make the work exceedingly good to hear.

SUNDAY TIMES.

He has succeeded in giving us a very picturesque and coherent Symphonic Poem, which is better worth listening to than almost anything from his pen.

THE SONG OF SAINT FRANCIS

("THE SONG OF BROTHER SUN").

FOR SOLI, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

BY

H. WALFORD DAVIES

(OP. 36).

Vocal Score, Price Three Shillings Net.

THE TIMES.

Each number is descriptive music, often of a very forcible kind, of the forces of nature, each one of which is called up in turn to the praise of the Lord. . . . The work ends with a majestic choral epilogue, "Laudate et benedicite Dominum."

But though one may find traces of "Everyman" and "Noble Numbers" and even of the forgotten oratorio "The Temple," in Dr. Davies's "Song of St. Francis" it does not rest there. The fresh subject makes him start afresh, just as Sir Henry Wood starts afresh in preparing his festivals. . . . Every work which Dr. Davies writes is something of an experiment, but behind the experimental brain the musical impulse is strong, and it asserts itself vigorously in such movements as "Of Brother Fire," and the Epilogue. It gives tender eloquence to the themes of the Water and "Of Sister Death." None of these in any way repeat what he has said before.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Dr. Walford Davies has always produced music that is elevated in aim and admirable in workmanship. He has always been true to himself. . . . In this, "The Song of St. Francis" or "The Song of the Sun," there are pages on pages of music full of the sheerest beauty.

THE MORNING POST.

Regarded from the point of view of the development it shows the work must be considered as one of Dr. Davies's best. In no previous composition, not even in his Symphony, has he indicated so much resource. . . . Much graphic power without the use of the obvious is revealed in the passages of Wind and Air, Water and Fire, but the mere material representation of these elements is not the outstanding feature; it is a certain psychological subtlety, the creation of intellectual music that represents mind as well as matter. . . . It is a worthy example of the high aim of modern British music.

THE STANDARD.

"The Song of St. Francis" is the work of a deep thinker, a remarkable musician, and one moreover who might at any moment make history, if not the sort of history beloved by the populace.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

The strange note of ecstatic näiveté would naturally appeal very strongly to the composer of "Everyman," which moves in the same atmosphere, and the music of which is archaic in idea and modern in utterance.

YORKSHIRE POST.

The texture of the choral writing is . . . exceedingly beautiful, and the composer uses the voices with a thorough appreciation of their quality and capacity. . . . What strikes one on a first hearing, more perhaps than anything else, is the success with which the mood of the words and their quaintly ecstatic note have been realised.

BIRMINGHAM DAILY POST.

That his characteristic note is a new one in music cannot be disputed. He has all the qualities of the mystic at his best—tenderness, sweetness, and the gift of suffusing the quite common things of life with an unsuspected meaning and beauty.

SHEFFIELD DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Dr. Walford Davies bids fair to repeat his "Everyman" success with his new setting of "The Song of St. Francis." . . . I know of no music cast in the same mould; it is Dr. Davies's own. In "The Song of St. Francis" he has again utilised it, plus a Palestrina-like polyphony of modal tendency, which seems to give the music a curious throw-back of period. . . . The effect is intensely spiritual and uplifting.

ODE ON THE NATIVITY

THE WORDS BY

WILLIAM DUNBAR

SET TO MUSIC

FOR SOPRANO SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

C. HUBERT H. PARRY.

Price Two Shillings.

Paper Boards, 2s. 6d. Cloth, 4s.

String Parts, 7s. In the Press); Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

THE TIMES.

It is a very happy work, full of a fresh, strong spirit of joyfulness. It opens with a simple pastoral theme which sets the tone of the whole and puts one in the presence of a strong personality brimming over with vitality. The swinging phrases of the "Rorate cœli desuper" begun by the soprano solo and taken up by the choir carry on the feeling and throughout the Ode is continuously woven out of these and similar materials. There is majesty in the call to the heavenly powers—"archangels, angels, and dominations"—to worship the Saviour, intimate tenderness in the appeal of the soprano solo, "Sinners, be glad and penance do," and the later stanzas calling upon all Nature in turn are touched with delightful suggestions of poetic feeling.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Sir Hubert Parry has given us a legitimate successor to "The Blest Pair of Sirens." . . . Dunbar's poem consists of six stanzas, each followed by the refrain "Et nobis Puer natus est," or nearly so. A lovely pastoral movement opens the cantata. . . . We have no composer, and have had none in the memory of living man, who could so well have extracted the liveliness from Dunbar's verses as Parry, none who could have maintained as well as struck the true note of healthy geniality, and maintained it so homogeneously, none who could have done this with a more marked individuality. . . . There is much that is beautiful for the soprano soloist, on this occasion Miss Ada Forrest, but nothing so lovely as the appeal to sinners to be glad unless it is the sublime gloriousness of the refrain of the fifth stanza and the superb sound of the chorus work in the final—a passage well worthy to rank with the famous close of Milton's Ode referred to at the beginning of this notice. . . . We are likely to hear far more of the Ode than of any of the immediately previous compositions by Sir Hubert Parry, and I, for one, will gladly be among the listeners whensoever called upon, for it is a work of sublime loftiness, of joyous feeling.

STANDARD.

It is difficult to decide which to admire more, the fidelity with which the composer repeatedly selects the same method to express his thoughts, or the ease with which he develops his subject and elaborates his contrapuntal themes. . . . There is some good eight-part writing, and the music for the double chorus in the final section is of characteristic strength and fibre, and ultimately develops into a powerful climax, which gives place to a serene treatment of "Pro nobis puer natus est," the refrain of the poem.

MORNING POST.

There is nothing complicated or diffuse in the music. The simple design adopted shows the hand of experience. Anything ornate would have been out of keeping with the nature of the poem. The customary resource of the composer is employed with full effect, and it remains yet another example of Sir Hubert Parry's power of writing vocal music that has a definite and individual ring. An appropriate atmosphere is established at the beginning by an introduction of pastoral character which creates a cheerful mental picture. The impression of simple joy is never disturbed throughout the work. Some broad unison effects from the chorus, a fine choral passage in Sir Hubert Parry's best style, illustrative of the celestial choirs, a melodious and well-written section for the solo voice, and a well-wrought climax before the calm end are the features in this gratifying work. . . . The fame of the work is likely to extend, carrying with it an increase of the renown of the composer.

STAR.

The composer has reproduced the archaic quaintness of the text and there is a fine joyousness about the music. It has an abundance of characteristic Parryish climaxes in which bustling figures tumble over each other in sheer exuberance of spirits, and sometimes, as in the charming pastoral opening, a higher imaginative note is touched. The skill with which the melody of the refrain is varied is notable.

TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

THE ORGAN

BY

JOHN STAINER.

Edited by JOHN E. WEST.

An important feature of the present Edition of this invaluable and popular Organ Primer is the adoption of the now universally recognized system of fingering—1.2.3.4.5., which is here substituted for the older system—×.1.2.3.4.—in all cases where fingering is marked.

In the explanatory portion of the book, opportunity has been taken of briefly mentioning one or two of the principal additions and improvements to the instrument which have been made since the book was first issued.

Bearing in mind that the Author's aim was to assist, in as concise a manner as possible, the early steps of an organ student, the Editor has refrained from adding any further exercises or pieces to those which were already given. But the addition of a few extra fingering and phrasing marks seemed necessary here and there, and, in the five concluding pieces, the laying-out of one or two of the manual passages has been rendered clearer to the player's eye by means of a slight re-staving.

The admirable explanations and diagrams of the Tubular-Pneumatic and Electric actions have been supplied by Mr. L. Simon, of Messrs. Norman & Beard, Ltd.

"The Sonatina must be classed as one of the finest works in modern organ literature. The first movement is practically in usual Sonata form. The development section is particularly brilliant, and the quiet cadence leading into the recapitulation is of arresting beauty."

"The slow movement, in the nature of a chaconne, is beautiful and restful. A brilliant cadenza leads to an exciting introduction to a most interesting triple fugue (confined to manuals). Afterwards the composer works backwards through the sections preceding the fugue, unwinding himself, as it were, before starting on a magnificent Coda befitting a magnificent work."—Daily Mail.

CONTAINING

THE CANTICLES NOTED

THE PSALTER NOTED

TO GREGORIAN TONES

TOGETHER WITH THE LITANY AND RESPONSES

A NEW EDITION

PREPARED BY

H. B. BRIGGS AND W. H. FRERE

UNDER THE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENCE OF

JOHN STAINER

(Late President of the Plainsong and Mediæval Music Society).

EXTRACT FROM INTRODUCTION.

The forms of the tones used at Salisbury have been adopted in this revision of the Psalter, and the pointing is based on the principles followed in the palmy days of Plainsong, and preserved in the early manuscripts. The rationale of this system is explained in the recent works of the Benedictines of Solesmes.

PREFACE.

THE first edition of The Psalter Noted was published in 1849 under the supervision of the late Rev. Thomas Helmore, and secured for the Gregorian Tones a general recognition of their appropriateness for Divine worship. Subsequently Mr. Helmore's scheme was enlarged by the issue of The Canticles Noted, of A Brief Directory, and of three Appendixes to the Psalter; and the whole collection was issued in one volume under the title of A Manual of Plainsong. The Manual had also two companion books, one of Words only, containing The Canticles and Psalter Accented, the other a collection of Accompanying Harmonies. Thus complete provision was made for the musical performance of the regular services of the Prayer Book. Practical objections, however, to the monotony of the recitation of several Psalms to one Tone without the relief of Antiphons, added to certain difficulties in the pointing, led to the issue of other Psalters which have competed with The Psalter Noted, but without obtaining, any of them, a marked supremacy; and nothing has been issued which covers the whole field so completely as Mr. Helmore's Manual.

Study of the art of Plainsong during the last half century has, however, undergone something like a revolution; on every branch of the question new light has been thrown, and not least upon the principles of pointing. In consequence of repeated demands for a new edition of the Manual, the work of revision was entrusted to the late Sir John Stainer. He readily undertook the task, and called into collaboration Mr. H. B. Briggs and the Rev. W. H. Frere, with the result that before his death he had passed for the press the greater part of the revised proofs prepared by them for the new edition. He had also devoted much time to the consideration, with Mr. Shebbeare, of the Organ Accompaniments, so that the complete work may be considered as his last contribution to the music of the English Church.

The Manual thus appears in a New Edition, revised in accordance with modern standards of taste and science; it does not cover quite so large a field as formerly, for it contains no music for the Holy Communion; but it has the same counterparts as before in the shape of The Canticles and Psalter Accented, and The Accompanying Harmonies prepared by Mr. Shebbeare, which include accompaniments for the Responses, Te Deum and Litany, as well as for the Tones.

The Competition Festival Record

No. 52.

THE BLACKPOOL MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

OCTOBER 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12.

Again we have to record the marvellous success of this great event. As we have on previous occasions remarked, the working of the competition Festival movement in all its phases can be studied with better advantage here than anywhere else in the country. The extraordinary zeal and ability, the evident desire not merely to compete and win but to learn something by contact and comparison, are the striking and encouraging features. No argument for the competition ideal can equal in appositeness the competition itself.

Inasmuch as the reports of the Festival in former years have filled a large book, we cannot do more here than give chief results and summary criticisms of the performances in the chief classes. It was computed that in all there were between six and seven thousand competitors. But it is not merely the number of competitors, or the size of audiences (there were over six thousand persons present on the last night) that gives real importance to the event. It is the character of the music selected as tests, and the fact that artistic performance is the ideal. That some of the choral tests were very severe—although they were not much more so than some of those used in previous years—led to criticism as to the wisdom of their being chosen. The fact is, it is infinitely easier to be sage and wise in laying down general principles in this matter than it is to give them application. Modern composers are choosing to write their unaccompanied choral music in a style that ignores possible difficulty—that is not their affair. We may presume that they conceive it in their brains as being perfectly performed, although we sometimes harbour a thought that some concoctions are purely experimental. All that Blackpool can do is to choose the best that is available from the best-known composers, and the choirs have got to live up to the demands of the music. It may be that in the end our composers will find their way to a simpler idiom—a consummation devoutly to be wished.

The solo-singing in the adult classes brought forward nearly 600 competitors. When the character of the tests in these classes is considered, it will be seen that to induce this large number of singers to study such music is alone a great achievement.

There are many points in connection with this colossal event that can be discussed with profit to all concerned in the movement. These matters we must reserve for a future occasion, when our Record is not crowded with lists and results.

The adjudicators were: Dr. W. G. McNaught, Mr. Percy Pitt, Mr. Frederic Austin, Dr. E. C. Bairstow, Mme. Edith Hands, Mr. Hermann Klein, Mr. Isidor Cohn, Mr. Isidore de Solla, Mr. F. Bonavia, Mr. C. H. Fogg, and Mr. Walter S. Nesbitt.

SUMMARY OF RESULTS.

ADULT VOCAL SOLOS.

As will be seen by the list below, these were divided into eight classes, each category of voice having a lyric section and a dramatic section. The process of hearing all the 600 took nearly the whole of two days. The singing revealed much talent. At the end of the second day the eight winners competed among themselves for a Rose Bowl. This drew an immense audience. The Rose Bowl fell to Miss Alice Brookes, who, although not gifted with much voice, displayed remarkable temperament and insight into the mysteries of Mr. Bantock's song.

BOYS' CHOIRS.

In this class the difficulties of the tests much hampered the singing. Dr. Walker's Trio demands high, expert skill. That it was attempted at all by the boys was creditable. The question arose as to whether these brave lads could get much joy out of the practice of music of this kind.

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Local).

Test: 'The death of Trenar' (Brahms).
(Accompaniment for two horns and a harp.)

This composition provided one of the sensations of the Festival. The committee, in their anxiety to do things completely, engaged two of the best horn-players of the day, Messrs. F. Paersch and F. W. Siddell, and a very competent harpist, Miss Winifred Cockerill. Several of the performances reached a very high grade, but it was reserved for Mr. Clifford Higgin's Choir to give an interpretation that seemed perfect in taste and technique, and that greatly moved the audience, including the adjudicators, Dr. McNaught and Dr. Bairstow.

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Open).

Test: 'Impromptu' (Sibelius).

This is a piece with a peculiar atmosphere. The accompaniment must be carefully adjusted to the choral balance, and be regarded as quite as important as the vocal part. It was not understood by all the choirs, but Mr. Aldous contrived to see through its meaning and to give an adequate performance.

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.
(Tenor Lead, 'A' Open.)

Tests: 'To the sea' (Max Reger).
'Kubla Khan' (Bantock).

The two tests in this class provided the hardest of nuts to crack. 'Kubla Khan' was difficult, but the Max Reger piece was even more difficult. It must be presumed to be possible; but there were some doubts expressed. In both pieces there are some magnificent moments. The Nelson Choir, under its able conductor, Mr. Lawrence Berry, deserved great praise for their approach to perfection in both pieces. The Stourbridge Choir gave a wonderfully good performance of 'Kubla Khan.' In this they were credited with one more mark than was gained by Nelson. It was no doubt the formidable nature of these tests that led to the entries in this important class being smaller than usual.

The task of sorting out four or five from seventeen excellent choirs was a very invidious and difficult one. Five were ultimately chosen, and they were well tested in Mackenzie's beautiful piece. Its technical difficulties are hard to overcome, but far beyond these the moods have to be revealed. Halifax contrived to give a thrilling performance which will live in the memory of all who were privileged to hear it. We append criticisms of the performances of each choir.

STOURBRIDGE.—(a) Began with good tone. Then sopranos deteriorated. Attack excellent generally, and the rhythm elastic. Occasional insecure tonal attack. Altos somewhat lacked sonority. A crisp performance, invariably tuneful and displaying much vitality. No very special excellence (80). (b) Tonal attack soon got vague. Chording imperfect. Anxious singing. A fine climax, bar 28. Some wrong notes. On the whole the effect was as though the singers were groping, and the moods of the piece were not definitely realised (70).

COVENTRY.—(a) Very bright, scintillating tone. A certain glow in the performance that was very attractive. Attack wonderfully precise. Full, fine blend. The fortes showed splendid resource. The more delicate parts were perhaps not treated so daintily as they can be (89). (b) A charming tone and blend, and the general unity showed the highest training. Bar 13, query soprano E? Masterly treatment of the rhythm and the moods of the piece. The end was wonderfully fine (94).

DOUGLAS.—(a) Tone not very well knit, so many different 'habits' going simultaneously; tenors, for instance, quite separate. Some uncertain entries—not wrong, but diffident. The fortes had excellent vitality, but were highly-urged, sudden spurts. Later the tenors sang notably well. Spirited, but not always wholly musical. Rather impulsive (80). (b) Much to admire in both the tone and treatment. Sopranos sang very effectively, displaying unity and expressive tone. One or two tonal uncertainties. Query the B flat, bar 28 (89).

SALE.—(a) The tone was not very attractive, and the execution at times savoured of anxiety. Consequently there was not sufficient unity. Basses adopted a gloomy resonance. The chording not always pure. Occasional good points in the expression (75). (b) An astonishing difference in tone and the insight of the treatment. Some beautiful expression and subtle delicacy. Climax splendid. The tone-colour at the più lento was very well secured. An excellent performance (91).

WALSALL.—(a) An admirable performance that erred in being somewhat too fast and feverish. Held attention by its fluency and constant variety. Colours laid on rather thickly. Showed remarkable expansion at the end (90). (b) The rubato treatment in the opening was very effective and well judged. A brown, doleful mood that was finely expressive of its words. Many delicate shades of expression. Tone good, if never exceptionally fine. Revealed a good deal, if not all, of the beauty of the piece (88).

KIDDERMINSTER.—(a) A fine start, but too stiff; pinched. Chippy as rhythmic style. Tremendous vitality in places. Sopranos in their eager enthusiasm developed a too keen tone. On the whole the emission of tone was not controlled (78). (b) Began admirably as style. 'Kiss'ú," bar 22, was obtrusively quitted. Tone fair, but never an obvious attraction. Fine expansion at climax, bars 28 and 29, 'As in my soul swells.' The interpretation did not realise all the moods of the piece. Ended too loudly and with a rather too abrupt release (77).

BLACKPOOL GLEE AND MADRIGAL.—(a) A suspicious E flat, bars 1 and 2. Very full, rich tone—it flowed out naturally, not being forced. The richness of the alto part much helped sonority. An attack practically perfect, and the tempi was well chosen and always under control by all concerned. A performance almost impeccable in its tone and taste (96). (b) Began with a slight vibrato, which however was not inappropriate. Altos charmingly treated at bar 3. This point, small as it was, quickened attention to all that followed—it was real interpretation. Lento seemed fast, but it was beautifully done. The climax was exciting, and yet fully controlled. The trying high A sharp at the end was nearly dead in tune (92).

BARROW.—(a) At once the full, rich tone and blend engaged the ear. Seemed a trifle heavy as rhythm; deliberate and inclined to be massive. But there was always complete unity, and the dynamic contrasts were well adjusted. An impressive performance that interested more on the tonal than on the rhythmic side (94). (b) The opening exhibited effective subordination of parts as called for. The splendour of the tone and the sostenuto treatment made the piece glow. The 'hists' were delightfully clear flicks of sound. The soprano attack of high notes (bar 20, high G, for instance) was admirable. Lento very eloquently treated. The passage, 'lulled into calm by their own melodies,' was very sympathetically sung. At the climax (bar 28) the choir began to sharpen, a process that was continued until the end, when they were nearly half a tone up. This sharpening did not affect the chording, but it increased the difficulty of the task of the sopranos at the end. On the whole many new points of the piece were revealed (93).

MR. ALDOUS'S LANCASTER CHOIR.—(a) Clear finish in the execution, and bright, blendful quality of tone. Once or twice some rather violent attack. Vitality extraordinary, needing some slight restraint (91). (b) Opening very soft indeed. Seemed a too fine drawn gossamer web tone. For some time the expression did not seem reflective enough. Bar 14 was not clear as notes. The tone was not perceptibly changed at the lento. At bar 33 the word 'their' was curiously emphasised. The più lento was finely treated. The last page showed troubled execution (87).

SCARBOROUGH.—(a) Began with a full forte. Query better to hold back the tone? Some very impulsive rather over-accented attack. Altos excellent. Page 4 was very good as tone, but had no definite expression. Tenors now and then produced uncomfortably. Basses attacked magnificently. It was evident that before the climaxes, and especially the final bars, we had already had the measure of the possible expansion of the tone (81). (b) Seemed rhythmically rather rigid, especially for the smooth sostenuto opening. Deserves more tender stroking. Sopranos sang brilliantly in places. Clear and sweet. The Lento was surely too fast. The pace helped to make the climax very exciting, but the attack here was not well controlled. On the whole not subtle and poetic enough (74).

BLACKPOOL ORPHEUS.—(a) Sopranos sang E natural at the opening. A smart pace and a good rhythmic attack. Ample vitality. Some tonal uncertainties, as though not all the singers knew the music thoroughly. The piano and the low tints of the piece were not made interesting, the expansions being much better. A good if not first-rate performance (84). (b) The pp near the beginning was only fairly successful. Later there was more control of vocal production. Bars 11, 12, and 25, 26 revealed uncertainties as to notes. The basses did not manage the difficult B flat entry, bar 28. The climax here was well-placed, but it was shrill. The mezzo-soprano point at bars 40 and 41 was very well brought out. On the whole a good conception, but tonally defective in execution (84).

HANLEY—(a) E flat in the first bars was very hazy. Good tone, with no exceptional sweetness or sonority. Sometimes the bite of the attack was too severe—it interfered with the blending. The rhythm had no special virtue. A rather formal performance (80). (b) The opening was not dulcet and sostenuto enough. Accent placed on 'gale' in nightingale. Needed more mood. Began to show uncertainty as to notes, and to sing some incorrectly. The expression of the middle section showed much more insight into the poetry. At bar 21, the second basses were wrong. The end had been carefully prepared, and was effective. A mixed performance (77).

STRETFORD.—(a) At once arresting, owing to the good tone and artistic treatment. An attractive rhythmic lilt, not overdone with accents. Maturity in the style. No tricks, no 'extras.' An excellent conception of the madrigalian style (93). (b) At once impressive. The tit-bit for each part in turn well-proportioned. The expression particularly good. Sopranos sang the high G, bars 21, 22, very finely, and showed complete control. Lento seemed rather fast, but on the whole the tempi were well-related. A masterly conception. Voices not so good as the interpretation (92).

COLNE.—(a) A fairly blendful tone, occasional 'oo' quality. Too fast, or at all events there were symptoms of haste, and lack of control of rhythm: over-eager. The colouring was brilliant, and to a small extent exaggerated. The vitality of the performance was remarkable (84). (b) Began well, but rather too quickly—notes not hugged enough. An impression of haste. Lento was almost con moto. This hindered the expansion of the climax. The last page was finely interpreted—it caught the moods of the poem (89).

HALIFAX.—(a) Very fast! Very clever, but is it appropriate for a madrigal, even of this sprightly kind? As with most choirs the forte alto lead, top of page 5, was too violent. High, warm colour; exciting; hectic sometimes. A splendid achievement of attack and complete unity. But was it on the right tack as an interpretation of the madrigal? (88.) (b) This was a remarkable performance. Supremely delicate where necessary. What did the baritones do at bar 3? Lento, excellent pace, allowed the climax to be big and grand. Some very searching expression. Fine conception, finely realised (97).

SOUTHPORT.—(a) A very bright, clear resonance. Attack faultless. We were spared the usual blow on page 5, second bar, alto. Many delicate points of phrase-treatment and a freedom from exaggeration. The tone was not so massive and grand as it was with some others (92). (b) Began rather too loudly. The altos sang very effectively. Some deft management of the phrasing. The 'hists' not quite defined. Not so deeply impressive as mood as with some other choirs. Many, but not all, of the potentialities of the piece were revealed (89).

BLACKPOOL (ADELAIDE ROAD).—(a) Tone musically resonant. Some tendency on the part of the sopranos to shrillness in the fortes. Altos very good. A somewhat excited treatment of the rhythm. The execution was most pleasantly fluent, and the attack was always tidy (87). (b) Seemed formal and unsympathetic. Creditable as technique. At the Lento there was no alteration of pace or style. The bass B flat entry, bar 28, was uncertain. The slight pause indicated at bar 35 was ignored. The tone often had a fine, rich blend. On the whole fair, but not striking (84).

THE FINAL TEST.

The following five choirs were selected to sing the third piece, 'My soul would drink those echoes' (Mackenzie).

COVENTRY.—A dreamy start at a well chosen-pace. Not very moody as expression. Tone big and grand, and the long phrasing adopted showed thought. Great earnestness, yet not convincing as interpretation. Seemed to miss the introspection of the words. Best at breadth and expansion. Not so good at delicacy (88, total 271).

BLACKPOOL GLEE AND MADRIGAL.—Opened very impressively; the style had great charm. The chording was not always perfect. Some glorious crescendos—not too steep. Caught a great deal of the message of the piece (92, total 280).

BARROW.—The equipment of the choir suits this piece, but the interpretation was not specially striking. The crescendo, page 5, led to a grandiose climax. Many excellent touches of technique. Some tonal uncertainty on page 13. The return to the original opening passage was beautifully sung, and the end page was marvellously well-managed (89, total 276).

STRETFORD.—Began very perceptively, as though they quite understood. The tone had beauty, but it did not expand to a grand forte at the allargando, page 6. Other similar passages missed fire. A gap was made before 'enjoyment,' page 11. The chording failed somewhat on page 13. On the whole they did not seem happy with the piece (82, total 267).

HALIFAX.—This performance probed the depths of the piece. It was intense in its expression, merging mood and technique into a wonderful unity. The resource displayed for expansion at the allargando on page 6 was enormous. The control of the stringendo on page 8 was another fine point. Then, as showing thought, the length of the phrases was notable, and this was a factor in the fine sostenuto effect. The end page exhibited a perfect morendo (97, total 282).

DISPLAY OF OLD ENGLISH DANCES.

A new and excellent feature of the Festival was a display of Old English Dances by teams from the neighbouring schools and clubs. It was not organized as a competition. Mr. Cecil Sharp was present, and the teachers had the advantage of his advice, which was given in private.

FIRST SET.

St. James's Church School (Mr. E. Greaves).
Morris and Country Dances.

New Lane C.E. School, Oswaldtwistle (Mr. George Clegg).
Morris Dances: 'Morris on'; 1 'Shepherds' Hey' (2nd version); 2 'Rigs o' Marlow'; 3 'Glorishears.'

New Lane C.E. School, Oswaldtwistle (Mr. George Clegg).
Country Dances: 1 'Hey! boys, up go we'; 2 'Newcastle'; 3 'Gathering peascods' (round for as many as will).

New Lane C.E. School, Oswaldtwistle (Mr. George Clegg).
Sword Dance, 'Kirby Malzeard.'

New Lane C.E. School, Oswaldtwistle (Mr. George Clegg).
Morris Dances: 'Jockie to the fair' (Morris jig); 'Brighton camp,' 'Green garters,' or 'Morris off.'

Linaker Street C.S., Southport (Miss Barton).
(a) Country Dance; (b) Morris Dance.

SECOND SET.

Victoria Settlement Club (Girls), Liverpool (Miss J. Edith McCrindell).
Country and Morris Dance.

Victoria Settlement Club (Lads), Liverpool (Mr. E. Greaves).

Adelaide Street C.S., Blackpool (Miss J. A. Robinson).
'Court Cards.'

St. Cuthbert's Seniors, South Shore (Mrs. Jordan and Miss F. Parkinson).
Morris Dance, 'Country Gardens.'

The following is an extract from an article on the Festival that appeared in The Times on October 14:

But the size of the thing and the fact that it attracts choirs from all parts of the country are not the most encouraging features; we would almost be inclined to say that they are the most discouraging ones. The real difficulty in making them useful as a means of artistic development comes at the point when choirs possessing an unlimited technique in vocal ensemble go from place to place winning or losing by a mark or two. That is the point which the Blackpool Festival is reaching as far as its choral competitions are concerned, and it is the moment at which it requires the most courageous handling if the splendid work that has already been done is not to be wasted. Granted that, as the committee points out in its preface to this year's programme, choirs are placed in no temptation to stump the country for the sake of the money won in prizes because their expenses far exceed the amount of the prizes, the 'pot-hunting' element may be just as strong as though they were making fortunes by their winnings. The mere desire to win is a fundamental characteristic of human nature and an indispensable one, but it may become as much the root of all evil as is the love of money. In this case its evil begins as soon as choirs or individuals win through the scoring of a point here and there in technique, because then the fact of winning is the only real distinction between the competitors. In such a case the competition offers them nothing to wish for but to win.

That danger is threatening some departments of the Blackpool Festival now, and it is because we have the keenest sympathy with the movement as a whole that we emphasize it. The effort to meet it by setting more and more difficult pieces each year in order to convince the competitors that they have not reached the top of the tree is inadequate. In the chief male-voiced competition (tenor lead) this year only two pieces, by Max Reger and Granville Bantock, were set, and their extreme difficulties succeeded in baffling the technique of the choirs at a good many points. The difficulty would be worth while if the result in the end were good or great music, but while both Reger's 'To the sea' and Bantock's 'Kubla Khan' are very difficult to sing, they are quite easy for the musician to read, and one can see at once that the final result could be nothing great. Unlike Delius's 'On Craig Dhu,' which was set for the mixed voices two years ago, and which, though too hard at the time, one could see would be a beautiful piece of music once it was mastered, and unlike Bantock's 'Lucifer in starlight,' set last year, which has really big possibilities, the better these works were sung, the clearer became their musical inferiority.

In this class of competition a reconsideration of the whole position seems needed, and we think that some of the drawbacks would be met if the male-voiced choirs were given one piece of a perfectly straightforward character which should be marked only for musical effect, the music being fine enough and the marks being high enough to compel conductors and singers to concentrate their whole musical perception upon it. Then we should get the desire to win stimulating the desire for excellence. The Elizabethan madrigal set each year for the mixed voices does this to some extent for them, though here we noticed that in spite of the careful training the notes themselves were not always impeccable when modal peculiarities appeared. Some of the best choirs on Saturday were not certain of the flat seventh in the scale passage which begins Wilbye's 'Ye that do live in pleasures.' Though it is admirable to include the old music here, it is less obviously necessary than it is for the male voices, for there is also a greater choice of modern work for mixed voices which is both exacting and musically fine in effect. More than one of the performances of Mackenzie's 'My soul would drink those echoes' were intensely beautiful in their refinement of feeling, especially that of the Halifax Choir. Another point worth consideration is the question of widening the choice of music by admitting an accompaniment to one or more of the test-pieces. In the South, where the standard of choral style is low, we naturally regard the fact of being able to sing without accompaniment as a virtue in itself. That is no special attainment in Lancashire and among the choirs who assemble there. They would scorn the idea of an accompaniment to keep them straight as heartily as a healthy man scorns a crutch. But is it not time for them to begin to realise that an accompaniment in big music has other uses than that of a crutch? The female choirs use it, and this year sang Sibelius's 'Impromptu,' Op. 19, with pianoforte accompaniment. Several of the choirs which brought their own accompanists, noticeably one from Douglas, showed remarkable feeling for the balance of ensemble between the voices and the pianoforte. Singers of all kinds need to realise the importance of instrumental music as something beyond themselves and their voices. By giving one accompanied test-piece the singers' horizon would be widened a little.

READING (NATIONAL TEMPERANCE CHORAL UNION).—September 28.

In connection with the Annual Festival of this organization, held at Reading on September 27, 28 and 29, some vocal solo contests, adjudicated by Mr. John S. Perry, and some choral contests, adjudicated by Dr. W. G. McNaught, were held. The tests and winners in the latter were as follows:

CHILDREN'S CHOIRS.

Tests: (a) 'Oh, the Summer' (Coleridge-Taylor).
(b) 'I sing because I love to sing' (Pinsuti).

1st. Lake Road Band of Hope.
Portsmouth (Mr. W. T. Sayer).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (under 50 singers).

Tests: (a) 'Mary Morison' (A. W. Moss).
(b) 'Good-night' (Holmval).

1st. Wesley Central Hall Choir, Portsmouth (Mr. R. C. Humphries).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (under 80 voices).

Tests: (a) 'A love symphony' (Knight).
(b) 'Admirals all' (Rendall).

1st Reading Temperance Choral Society (Mr. A. W. Moss).

MANCHESTER.—October 2.

The third Competitive Musical Festival organized by the Manchester and District Nonconformist Choir Union this season was, like the last, held at the White City, being devoted mainly to the juveniles and adult quartet parties. The following were the various classes and principal prize-winners:

Boys' Solo ... 'Nymphs and Shepherds' ... Purcell.
Walter Willerton, Stalybridge.

Girls' Solo ... 'I've been roaming' ... Horn.
Ellen Royle, Urmston.

Senior Pianoforte Solo, 'Allegro in G' ... ... Mozart.
Marjorie G. Brown, Stretford.

Male-Voice Quartets, 'After many a dusty mile'... Elgar.
'Hydrode,' West Gorton.

Male-Voice Quartets, 'O love, they wrong thee much,' Parry.
Hyde Road Quartet, West Gorton.

Mr. T. Tertius Noble adjudicated.

BELLE VUE, MANCHESTER.—October 4.

The four annual musical contests held at these popular Zoological Gardens opened with the Diamond Jubilee Brass Band contest on September 2, and closed with the eleventh annual choral contest on October 4.

This year's entries in the class for Mixed-Voice Choirs were double the number of those last year, owing no doubt in some measure to the comparatively easy and tuneful nature of the tests selected, namely, Stainer's Victorian madrigal, 'Flora's Queen,' and Elgar's 'O happy eyes.'

Of the fourteen choirs which entered, the following twelve faced the adjudicators:

Failsworth Co-operative Choral Society (Mr. J. E. Smith).
Manchester Clarion Vocal Union (Mr. T. Corlett).
Stalybridge Vocal Society (Mr. G. Leigh).
Crosland Moor (Mr. R. H. Dyson).
Sale and District Musical Society (Mr. A. Higson).
1st. Atherton Baptist Choral Society (Mr. G. Meadows).
Mossley Vocal Society (Mr. J. Shaw).
Salford Vocal Society (Mr. F. W. Blacow).
2nd. Armley Choral Society (Mr. H. H. Pickard).
Bradford Vocal Union (Mr. J. Barker).
Tideswell Choral Society (Mr. C. Ashover).
3rd. Abbey Hey Choral Society, Gorton (Mr. A. Baxter).

It must be admitted that the success of the Atherton Choir came as a surprise, many competent judges being inclined to award the pride of place to Armley for an exquisite reading of the Elgar part-song. The victory of Abbey Hey was a popular one, seeing that this choir comes from the district in which the Gardens are situated.

The entries in the Mixed-Voice Church or Chapel Class (twenty-three in all) were again so numerous that a preliminary contest was held, leaving the following five to sing the test-piece, Stainer's anthem, 'O clap your hands,' once again:

1st. St. John the Baptist, Oldham (Mr. H. Brookes).
3rd. Mount Tabor United Methodist, Stockport (Mr. J. W. Bray).
Ryecroft Independent, Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. J. Ramsden).
United Methodist, Stalybridge (Mr. J. Goddard).
2nd. Radcliffe Bridge Wesleyan (Mr. E. Barnes).

The 130 competitors heard in the four Solo-Voice Classes were this year restricted in their choice of songs to two standard pieces for each voice, Miss May Chanter (Bradford) carrying off first prize in the soprano class with Wagner's 'Elizabeth's greeting,' and Miss Mabel Willey (Bradford) securing premier honours among the contraltos with Goltz's 'Melisande in the woods.' Mr. J. E. Rhodes (Mossley) headed the tenor list with Leoncavallo's 'On with the motley,' and Mr. V. Crowther (Earby) attained pride of place amongst the basses with Schubert's 'The wanderer.'

A strong quintet of judges was provided in Mr. R. H. Wilson, Mr. T. Tertius Noble, Mr. C. H. Fogg, Mr. T. E. Pearson (conductor of Colne Valley Vocal Union), and Mr. John Holgate.

STOCKSBRIDGE.—October 4 and 5.

Beyond all doubt, the Stocksbridge Festival of this year was a distinct musical advance upon previous Festivals, although the entry lists suffered from the fact that a neighbouring competition was held concurrently. Both the test-pieces and the performance of them were of good quality, and the keenness and interest displayed were exemplary. We summarise the results below. The adjudicator was Dr. W. G. McNaught.

SOLO CLASSES, ETC.

Pianoforte.—Ida Woodcock.
Boys' vocal solo.—Douglas Gordon Sadler.
Soprano.—Olive K. Gibson.
Contralto.—Gladys Bullen.
Tenor—Alfred Jones.
Bass—Reginald Jacques.
Male-Voice Quartet—Stocksbridge P.M.
Mixed-Voice Quartet.—Thurlston Quartet.

MALE-VOICE CHOIR.

Tests: 'Feasting, I watch' (Elgar).
'The patriot's vow' (Cornelius).

1st. Cambrian, Sheffield (Mr. W. E. Poppleton).
2nd. Royston.

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests: 'Fire, fire, my heart' (Morley).
'The dawn of song' (Bairstow).

1st. Stocksbridge Congregational Choral Union (Dr. W. M. Robertshaw).
2nd. Sheffield Clarion Vocal Union.

OTHER CHORAL CLASSES.

Female-Voice Choirs.—Stocksbridge Congregational (Dr. W. M. Robertshaw).

Local Male-Voice Choirs.—Stocksbridge P.M. (Mr. F. W. Hill).

Church and Chapel Choirs.—Stocksbridge P.M. (Mr. T. W. Slater).

Junior Choirs.—Abbeydale Boys' School, Sheffield (Mr. G. Norman).

MEXBOROUGH.—October 4 and 5.

Gratifying results have attended the labours of those who are responsible for this new Festival, and our congratulations are extended to Dr. J. Gardner (president), Mr. G. A. Nixon (hon. musical director), and Messrs. S. R. Johnson and A. Swainson (hon. secretaries). Entries were numerous, and the adjudicator, Mr. Harry Evans, expressed himself as well pleased with the musical standard.

Two junior choral competitions were decided on the Friday. Doncaster Road C.S. (Mr. A. Brown) were first in a class for Mexborough Elementary Day Schools; Birdwell C.S. (Mr. H. W. Penlington) in an open class for such schools.

MIXED-VOICED CHOIRS (Open).

1st. Goole Christchurch Congregational (Mr. A. White).
Doncaster Hull Gate Free Christian Church (Mr. P. H. Blytte).

In an open class for string orchestras Barnsley Symphony Orchestra (Mr. B. Langdale) were successful.

Prizes for solo performances were awarded to Miss Elsie M. Braham (soprano), Miss Agnes J. Ridgeway (contralto), Mr. E. Robinson (tenor), Mr. R. Robinson (bass), Mr. S. H. Haigh (violin), and Miss Doris Muxlow; and for quartet singing to the Orpheus Quartet, Birdwell (mixed), and the Apollo Quartet, Mexborough (male).

The adult choral competitions resulted as follows:

CHURCH CHOIRS (within 12 miles' radius).

1st. Worsborough Parish Church (Mr. H. W. Penlington).

NONCONFORMIST CHURCH CHOIRS (within 12 miles' radius).

1st. Mexborough Oxford Road (Mr. J. W. Watts).
2nd. Hoyland Common Wesleyan (Mr. A. Robinson).
3rd. Mexborough Wesleyan (Mr. W. Butter).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Open).

1st. South Hiendley (Mr. E. E. Hoyland).
2nd. Stocksbridge Wesleyan (Mr. A. Marshall).

BLUNDELL'S SCHOOL.

Mr. H. Moreton, Plymouth, borough organist, was the adjudicator between five choirs who competed on October 10 in the Annual Glee Competition at Blundell's School, Tiverton. The test-piece was Sullivan's 'The long day closes,' and the choirs were marked in the following scale: North Close, 78; Westlake, 67; Day Boys, 63; Petergate, 58; Old House, 57.

NELSON ARION GLEE UNION.
(MALE VOICES.)

This excellent body was formed in September, 1887, with a membership of seven voices. The first rehearsals were held in the cottage homes of the members. It has now a membership of sixty voices, composed almost entirely of men who earn their livelihood in the cotton mills of the district. There are still two of the original members on the books. The following prizes have been won since 1904, out of forty competitions for which the Choir entered:

Firsts.	Seconds.	Thirds.
24	9	6

Included in the above are prizes at Blackpool, Southport, Lytham, Preston, New Brighton, Shrewsbury, &c. The most eminent adjudicators have frequently expressed their admiration of the singing of the Choir.

It has now set the seal upon its successes by gaining the Challenge Shield at Blackpool at the competition reported in our present issue.

RÉPERTOIRE OF THE CHOIR (180 works).

The following are some composers of glees and part-songs in the library:

Mendelssohn
MacDowell.
Max Reger.
Schumann.
Spohr.

THE

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

YORK GATE, MARYLEBONE ROAD, N.W.

INSTITUTED, 1822. INCORPORATED BY ROYAL CHARTER, 1830.

Patron: HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

President: H.R.H. THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT AND STRATHEARN, K.G.

Principal—SIR ALEXANDER CAMPBELL MACKENZIE, Mus.D., LL.D., D.C.L., F.R.A.M.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC offers to students of both sexes (whether amateur or professional) a thorough training in all branches of music under the most able and distinguished Professors. In addition to receiving individual lessons in the various branches of the Curriculum, students have the advantage of attending the Orchestral, Choral, and Chamber Music Classes, and the weekly Lectures on music and musicians. Evidence of their progress is given at the Fortnightly and Public Concerts and by periodical Operatic and Dramatic Performances.

There are three Terms in the Academic year—viz., the Michaelmas Term, from Michaelmas to Christmas; the Lent Term, from early in January to Easter; and the Midsummer Term, from early in May until the end of July.

The Fee for the ordinary curriculum is 12 Guineas per Term.

A large number of Scholarships and Prizes are founded and are competed for periodically.

Students who show special merit and ability receive the distinction of being elected by the Directors Associates of the Institution, and are thereby entitled to the use after their names of the initials A.R.A.M. Students who distinguish themselves in the musical profession after quitting the Institution may be elected by the Directors Fellows of the Royal Academy of Music, and are thereupon entitled to the use after their names of the initials F.R.A.M.

Subscribers have the privilege of attending the Lectures and Public Concerts and of introducing friends in proportion to the amount of their subscriptions.

An examination of persons trained independently of the Academy is held twice a year—viz., during the Summer and Christmas vacations—successful candidates at which are elected Licentiates of the Academy, and are thereupon entitled to the use after their names of the initials L.R.A.M. The syllabus is issued annually at Easter. Last day for entry for the September Examination, June 29; for the Christmas Examination, October 31.

An examination of persons engaged in the Training of Children's Voices is held in September and during the Christmas Vacation, and a certificate is granted to successful candidates.

A Special Course of Lecture Lessons for Professional Music Teachers has been instituted, to be followed by an Examination for the distinction of Associateship.

Prospectus, entry form, and all further information may be obtained on application.

F. W. RENAUT, Secretary.
